The female is 23 or 24 inches long, the male smaller. The sexes are similar in color, slaty-blue on the upper parts, cross-barred below with dark color on a whitish ground, the wings and tail barred. The young are dark-brown above, streaked lengthwise below. This bird flies low, and pursues its prey in a line after it, or in the manner called "raking" by falconers. The female is generally flown by falconers at rabbits, hares, etc., and the larger winged game, while the male is usually flown at the smaller birds, principally partridges. The American goshawk is A. atricapillus, a larger and handsomer species than the European, very destructive to poultry, and hence commonly known as hen-hawk or chicken-hawk. There are several others. See cut under Astur.

Christ, who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel. 2 Tim. i. 10.

2. The story of Christ's life, teachings, sufferings, death, resurrection, and ascension; hence, one of the books in which that story was originally told: as, the Gospel of Matthew. [Preferably with a capital letter when used in a titular sense, but not in the general senses.] The gospels are four in number — those of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John. Of these four, those of Matthew and John were written by apostles and eye-witnesses, that of Luke is avowedly gathered from others who were witnesses, and that of Mark has been from a very early age believed to be written by a disciple of the apostle Peter. The first three gospels are known as the synoptic gospels, because combined they present a general and harmonized view of Christ's life. The Johannine origin of the fourth has been much disputed. Matthew and Mark confine themselves chiefly to Christ's ministry in Galilee; Luke adds an account of his ministry in Perea; John alone records his ministry in Judea, except that portion of it connected with the Passion. There are also apocryphal gospels which are not regarded as genuine by any scholars, either Protestant, Roman Catholic, or Greek. The more important of these are: the Gospel of the Birth of Mary, an account of Mary's birth, youth, and espousals; the Pro-evangelion, a somewhat similar account; the Gospels I. and II. of the Infancy of Jesus Christ; and the Gospel of Nicodemus, also called the Acts of Pontius Pilate, being an account of the crucifixion of Christ and his experiences in Hades.

Thei knewen him in brekynge of Bred, as the Gospelle seythe; Et cognoverunt eum in fractione Pania.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 116.

He [Luke] seith in his godspel,
And scheweth hit by ensaumple vr soules to wisse.
Piers Plowman (A), viii. 112.

The Testimony of every one of these Churches did shew the concurrence of all the Apostles as to the Doctrine contained in the several Gospels. Stillingfleet, Sermons, III. ii.

3. The doctrine and precepts inculcated by Christ and recorded in the original accounts of his life and teachings.

The gospel of Christ. Phil. i. 27.

Taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. 2 Thes. i. 8.

Remember that Jesus Christ of the seed of David was raised from the dead according to my gospel. 2 Tim. ii. 8.

A distinct conception of the spirit of the Apostolic age is necessary for a right understanding of the relation of the Gospel to the Gospels — of the divine message to the lasting record — at the rise of Christianity.
Westcott, Introd. to the Study of the Gospels, iii.

Hence — 4. Any doctrine, religious or secular, maintained as of great or exclusive importance.

We have had somewhat too much of the "gospel of work." It is time to preach the gospel of relaxation.
H. Spencer, Pop. Sci. Mo., XXII. 358.

The revolt of the American provinces of the British empire forced the idea of self-government, not as a local British invention, but as a sort of political gospel, upon general belief. Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 236.

5. A portion of Scripture taken from one of the four gospels, and appointed to be read in liturgical churches as a part of the church service. The gospel is the last and principal of the two or more eucharistic lections in all liturgies. In the Western churches the portions are selected with reference to their appropriateness to the day or season; in the Eastern they are read in consecutive order except on special festivals. In ancient times the gospel was read in the West, as in the East, from the ambo, sometimes from a distinct ambo of its own, later from a desk on an elevated place between nave and choir, called the "pulpit" (pulpitum), which developed, as it was made more and more lofty, into the rood-loft or jube. In later times it was read from a lectern on the floor of the sanctuary, or from the north side of the altar — that is, from that part of the front of the altar which is at the right hand of the altar crucifix, or of the priest, if he stands in the middle and faces the people. The north side is therefore called the gospel side of the altar, and in Latin this side, or, more strictly, the corner beyond it, is termed cornu Evangelii, the horn of the gospel, or gospel horn of the altar. In the Anglican Church the deacon, or person who acts as deacon, at the celebration of the holy communion, is called the gospeler, from his function of reading the gospel. The custom of delivering a book of the gospels to a deacon at his ordination originated in England, and afterward became a usage in the whole of the Western Church.

6. That which is infallibly true; absolute truth. [Colloq.]

Oates was encourag'd, and every thing he affirm'd taken for gospel. Evelyn, Diary, Oct. 1, 1678.

II. a. Pertaining or relating to the gospel; accordant with the gospel; evangelical.

Weel prosper a' the gospel lads

'goose-summer,' < ME. gos, goose, + somer, summer (cf. equiv. E. dial. summer-goose, also summer-gauze, accom. to gauze); a name of popular origin, alluding to the downy appearance of the film, and to the time of its appearance. Cf. the equiv. D. zomerdraden, pl., = Sw. sommartråd, 'summer-thread'; G. sommerfäden, pl., 'summer-threads.' The Sc. gosummer, the latter end of summer, is appar. an ingenious adaptation of gossamer, gossummer, to denote the time when summer goes; cf. go-harvest.] I. n. 1. A fine filmy substance, consisting of cobweb formed by various small spiders, and only, according to some, when they are young. It is seen in stubble-fields and on low bushes, and also floating in the air in calm, clear weather, especially in autumn. Threads of gossamer are often spun out into the air several yards in length, till, catching a breeze, they lift the spider and carry it on a long aërial voyage.

Betwene wolle and gossomer is a grete difference.
Lydgate, Order of Fools, l. 55.

A louer may bestride the gossamours,
That ydles in the wanton Summer ayre,
And yet not fall. Shak., R. and J., ii. 6 (fol. 1623).

gossan, gozzan (goz'an), n. [E. dial. (Corn.); cf. gozzan, an old wig grown yellow from age and wearing.] In mining, the ferruginous quartzose material which often forms a large part of the outcrop of a lode in which the metallic contents at depths exist chiefly in the form of sulphids, among which pyrites, a combination of sulphur and iron, is rarely wanting, and is often present in large quantity. These sulphids becoming oxidized, the resulting brown oxid of iron remains mixed with the gangue, of which the larger part is usually quartz; and this dark, rusty-brown material is the gossan of the Cornish miner, a term also in very common use in other mining regions. It is the eisenhut of the German and the chapeau de fer of the French miners; and, indeed, the corresponding term in English, the iron hat, is not unfrequently heard in the United States.

Maine, Early Law and Custom, p. 257.

2. Idle talk; gossip.

Now, this our poor fellow-citizen, Oliver Proudfute, having been active in spreading these reports, as indeed his element lay in such gossipred, some words passed betwixt him and me on the subject. Scott, Fair Maid of Perth, xx.

gossipry (gos'ip-ri), n. [Formerly also gossiprie; < gossip + -ry.] 1†. Intimacy.

As to that bishoprick, he would in no wise accept of it without the advice of the Generall Assembly, & nevertheless er the next Assembly he was seized hard & fast on the bishoprick, whereby all gossiprie gade up between him and my uncle Mr. Andrew. Melvill's MS., p. 36.

2. Gossipy conversation; current talk or report.

And many a flower of London gossipry
Has dropped whenever such a stem broke off.
Mrs. Browning, Aurora Leigh, viii.

gossipy (gos'ip-i), a. [< gossip + -y[1].] Pertaining to or characterized by gossip; hence, chatty; entertaining by a light, pleasing style of conversation or writing.

The politicians of the lobby . . . came dangerously near to gossipy prophecy.
Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XXXIX. 1.

gossomer†, n. An earlier spelling of gossamer.

gossoon (go-sön'), n. [A corruption of F. garçon, a boy, a servant: see garçon, garcion.] A boy; a male servant. [Ireland.]

In most Irish families there used to be a bare-footed gossoon, who was slave to the cook and the butler, and who in fact, without wages, did all the hard work of the house. Gossoons were always employed as messengers.
Miss Edgeworth, Castle Rackrent, p. 93.

gossypine (gos'i-pin), a. [< Gossypium + -ine[1].] In bot., cottony; resembling cotton.

Gossypium (go-sip'i-um), n. [NL., < L. gossypion, gossipion, also called gossympinus, the cotton-tree; the word has a Gr. semblance, but is prob. of Eastern origin.] A malvaceous genus of herbs and shrubs, natives of the tropics, and important as yielding the cotton of commerce. They have usually 3- to 5-lobed leaves, showy axillary flowers surrounded by three large cordate bracts, and a 3- to 5-celled capsule, the seeds densely covered by long woolly hairs. About 10 species are recognized, though many others have been proposed. The cultivated species are natives of Asia, Africa, and America. Some of them have been planted from very early times, and many varieties have been produced. All the cotton manufactured in civilized countries is the product of several varieties of a few species: G. hirsutum (American upland cotton), G. herbaceum (Asiatic cotton), G. Barbadense (sea-island and Egyptian cotton), and G. Peruvianum (South American cotton). The lint of G. arboreum is also used to a slight extent in the tropics. See cotton, I. n., 1, and cotton-plant.

gost†, gostly†, etc. The more correct but obsolete spellings of ghost, ghostly, etc. Chaucer.

gosudar, n. See hospodar.

go-summer† (gō'sum″ėr), n. [Cf. go-harvest, and see gossamer.] The latter end of summer; the last warm and fine weather. [Scotch.]

The go-summer was matchless fair in Murray, without winds, wet, or any storm.
Spalding, Hist. Troubles in Scotland, I. 34.

got (got). Preterit of get[1].

got, gotten (got, got'n). Past participles of get[1].

gota (gō'tä), n. [E. Ind.] Lace: its name in the north of India, where its manufacture is but recent. (a) A gold or silver lace, the variety being indicated by some qualifying word. (b) A lace made of white cotton thread.

gotch (goch), n. [E. dial. Cf. (?) It. gozzo, a kind of bottle.] An earthen jug or pitcher with a bulging body.

He repaired to the kitchen and seated himself among the rustics assembled over their evening gotch of nog, joined in their discourse. The Village Curate.

gote[1]†, n. An obsolete form of goat[1].

gote[2] (gōt), n. [< ME. gote, a drain, = OD. gote, a ditch, channel, gutter, sewer, = G. gosse, a drain; akin to E. gut, which is used in a similar sense: see gut.] 1†. A drain, sluice, ditch, or gutter.

There arose a great controversie about the erecting of two new gotes at Skirbek and Langare for drayning the waters out of South Holand and the Fens.
Dugdale's Imbanking (1662), p. 243. (Halliwell.)

2. A deep miry place. [North. Eng. and Scotch.]

Also spelled goat.

goter†, n. An obsolete form of gutter[1]. Chaucer.

Goth (goth), n. [= D. Goth = G. Gothe = Sw. Göter = Dan. Goter = F. Goth = Sp. Pg. Godo = It. Goto, < LL. Gothus, Gr. Γότθος, usually in pl., LL. Gothi, Gr. Γόθοι, prob. the same name, etymologically, as L. Gothones, Gotones (Tacitus), Gutones (Pliny), Gr. Γύθωνες (Ptolemy), etc., applied to Teut. peoples, being accom. forms (LL. better Goti*) of Goth. Guts*, pl. Gutos*, inferred from Goth. Gut-thiuda, the 'Goth-people,' < Guts*, Goth, + thiuda = AS. theód, people: see Dutch.] 1. One of an ancient Teutonic race which appeared in the regions of the lower Danube in the third century A. D. A probable hypothesis identifies them with the Gothones or Guttones who dwelt near the Baltic; but there is little reason to believe in their relationship with the Getæ or in their Scandinavian origin. They made many inroads into different parts of the Roman empire in the third and fourth centuries, and gradually accepted the Arian form of Christianity. The two great historical divisions were the Visigoths (West Goths) and the Ostrogoths (East Goths). A body of Visigoths settled in the province of Mœsia (the present Servia and Bulgaria), and were hence called Mœsogoths; and their apostle Wulfila (Ulfilas) translated the Scriptures into Gothic. The Visigoths formed a monarchy about 418, which existed in southern France until 507 and in Spain until 711. An Ostrogothic kingdom existed in Italy and neighboring regions from 493 to 555. By extension the name was applied to various other tribes which invaded the Roman empire.

I am here with thee and thy goats, as the most capricious poet, honest Ovid, was among the Goths.
Shak., As you Like it, iii. 3.

Shall he [the gladiator] expire,
And unavenged? Arise! ye Goths, and glut your ire!
Byron, Childe Harold, iv. 141.

2. One who is rude or uncivilized; a barbarian; a rude, ignorant person; one defective in taste: from the character of the Goths during their early irruptions into Roman territory.

I look upon these writers as Goths in poetry.
Addison, Spectator, No. 62.

What do you think of the late extraordinary event in Spain? Could you have ever imagined that those ignorant Goths would have dared to banish the Jesuits!
Chesterfield.

Gothamist (gō'tham-ist), n. [< Gotham, a village (perh. the one of that name in Nottinghamshire) proverbial for the blundering simplicity of its inhabitants ("the wise men of Gotham"), of which many ludicrous stories were told.] A simple-minded person; a simpleton. See the etymology.

Gothamite (gō'tham-īt), n. [< Gotham + -ite[2].] An inhabitant of Gotham (see Gothamist), and, by transfer, of the city of New York, to which the name was humorously applied in allusion to the stories of "the wise men of Gotham." [The term was first used by Washington Irving in "Salmagundi," 1807.]

A most insidious and pestilent dance called the Waltz . . . was a potent auxiliary; for by it were the heads of the simple Gothamites most villainously turned.
Salmagundi, No. 17.

Gothiant†, n. [< Goth + -ian.] A Goth.

More like vnto the Grecians than vnto the Gothians in handling of their verse.
Ascham, The Scholemaster, p. 145.

Gothic (goth'ik), a. and n. [= F. Gothique = Sp. Gótico = Pg. Gothico = It. Gotico (cf. D. G. Gothisch = Dan. Gotisk = Sw. Götisk), < LL. Gothicus, < Gothus, pl. Gothi, Goths: see Goth.]

I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to the Goths: as, Gothic customs; Gothic barbarity.

The term Gothic, as applied to all the styles invented and used by the Western Barbarians who overthrew the Roman Empire and settled within its limits, is a true and expressive term both ethnographically and architecturally.
J. Fergusson, Hist. Arch., I. 397.

Hence—2. Rude; barbarous.

That late, and we may add gothic, practice of using a multiplicity of notes. Goldsmith, Int. to Hist. World.

When do you dine, Emilia? At the old Gothic hour of four o clock, I suppose.
Mrs. Marsh, Emilia Wyndham, xxi.

3. An epithet commonly applied to the European art of the middle ages, and more particularly to the various Pointed types of architecture generally prevalent from the middle of the twelfth century to the revival of study of classical models in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. This epithet was originally applied in scorn (compare def. 2), by Italian Renaissance architects, to every species of art which had existed from the decay of Roman art until the outward forms of that art were revived as patterns for imitation; but, although no longer used in a depreciative sense, the adjective is inappropriate as applied to one of the noblest and completest styles of architecture ever developed, which owes nothing whatsoever to the Goths, and is seldom now described as Gothic in other languages than English. See medieval and Pointed.

The roof had some non-descript kind of projections called bartizans, and displayed at each frequent angle a small turret, rather resembling a pepper-box than a Gothic watch-tower. Scott, Waverley, viii.

The principle of Gothic building, that every part, including what might seem at first sight as mere ornament, should have a constructive value, was never adopted by Italian builders.
C. E. Norton, Church-building in Middle Ages, p. 136.

4. In liturgics, an epithet sometimes applied to the Mozarabic liturgy, or to the Gallican family of liturgies, in accordance with an incorrect theory that they were first introduced into Gaul and Spain by the Visigoths, or from the fact that they were in use in Gallican and Spanish churches at the time of Gothic domination. An ancient manuscript of the Gallican liturgy still extant is entitled a Gothic Missal (Missale Gothicum) by a later hand.

II. n. 1. The language of the Goths. The Goths spoke various forms of a Teutonic tongue now usually classed with the Scandinavian as the eastern branch of the Teutonic family, though it has also close affinities with the western branch (Old High German, Anglo-Saxon, etc.). All forms of Gothic have perished without record, except that spoken by some of the western Goths (Visigoths), who at the beginning of the fourth century occupied Dacia (Wallachia, etc.), and who before the end of that century passed over in great numbers into Mœsia (now Bulgaria, etc.). Revolting against the Roman empire, they extended their conquests even into Gaul and Spain. Their language, now called Mœsogothic or simply Gothic, is preserved in the fragmentary remains of a nearly complete translation of the Bible made by their bishop, Wulfila (a name also used in the forms Ulfila, Ulphila, Ulfilas) (who lived in the fourth century A. D.), and in some other fragments. These remains are of the highest philological importance, preceding by several centuries the next earliest Teutonic records (Anglo-Saxon and Old High German). The language bears a primitive aspect, indicating its existence under practically undisturbed linguistic conditions for a long period before its appearance in the records. Apart from the Latin and Greek words introduced with Christianity, Gothic shows little trace of foreign influence except in the presence of a few words borrowed from the neighboring Slavs. As the oldest recorded Teutonic tongue, and usually but not always nearest the original Teutonic type, it stands at the head of the languages of its class, to which it bears a relation like that of the Sanskrit to the other languages of the Indo-European family.

2. In bibliography, an early form of black-faced and pointed letters, as shown in printed books and manuscripts.—3. [l. c.] The American name for a style of square-cut printing-type without serifs or hair-lines, after the style of old Roman mural letters. What is called simply gothic in America is known in England as grotesque, and lighter faces known in England as sans-serif are in America called gothic condensed, light-face gothic, etc.

THIS LINE IS IN GOTHIC.

4. The so-called Gothic style of architecture. See I., 3.

The parish church of Lambeth is at a small distance from the Palace, has a plain tower, and the architecture is of the Gothic of the time of Edward IV.
Pennant, London, Lambeth Church.

Gothical (goth'i-kal), a. [< Gothic + -al.] Same as Gothic. [Rare.]

Gothicism (goth'i-sizm), n. [< Gothic + -ism.] 1. A Gothic idiom.—2. Resemblance or conformity to, or inclination for, the so-called Gothic style of architecture: a term generally used disparagingly.

I am glad you enter into the spirit of Strawberry Castle; it has a purity and propriety of Gothicism in it.
Gray, Letters.

3. Rudeness of manners; barbarousness; barbarism.

Night, Gothicism, confusion, and absolute chaos are come again. Shenstone.

Without ranging myself among classics, I assure you, were I to print any thing with my name, it should be plain Horace Walpole; Mr. is one of the Gothicisms I abominate. Walpole, Letters, II. 322.

Gothicize (goth'i-sīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. Gothicized, ppr. Gothicizing. [< Gothic + -ize.] To make Gothic; hence, to render barbaric. Also spelled Gothicise.

The language and manners of the higher ranks are not gothicized. Strutt, Queenhoo Hall.

They have lately gothicised the entrance to the Inner Temple-hall, and the library front. Lamb, Old Benchers.

Gothish (goth'ish), a. [< Goth + -ish[1].] Like the Goths; hence, rude; uncivilized. [Rare.]

gotiret, n. [An irreg. var. of guitar.] A guitar. Davies.

Touch but thy lire, my Harrie, and I heare
From thee some raptures of the rare gotire.
Herrick, Hesperides, p. 296.

go-to-bed-at-noon (gō'tǒ-bed'at-nön'), n. The goat's-beard, Tragopogon pratensis: so called from the early closing of its flowers.

go-to-meeting (gō'tǒ-mē'ting), a. Proper to be worn to church; hence, best: applied to clothes. [Colloq. and humorous.]

Brave old world she is after all, and right well made; and looks right well to-day in her go-to-meeting clothes.
Kingsley, Two Years Ago, xiv.

I want to give you a true picture of what every-day school life was in my time, and not a kid-glove and go-to-meeting coat picture.
T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, ii. 5.

gouache (gwäsh), n. and a. [F., water-colors, water-color painting, < It. guazzo, ford, puddle, splash, water-colors, < guazzare, stir, shake, agitate, ford, water (a horse), etc., = F. gâcher, temper, bungle, < OHG. wascan, G. waschen = E. wash: see wash, v.] I. n. 1. A method of painting with water-colors mixed and modified with white, so as to be opaque and to present a dead surface. This process is much used in Italy to supply at a small price views of landscapes, ancient monuments, etc. It is well adapted to produce, in skilful hands, an excellent effect with little labor, especially when the observer is at some distance. The method is useful also for scenery in theaters and the like.
2. Work painted according to this method.—3. A pigment used in such painting.

The Orientals paint, as it were, with translucid gouache; they lay on their tones with a vitreous fluid mixed with coloring matter. Harper's Mag., LXXVII. 660.

II. a. Noting the method of painting known as gouache, or a work executed by that method.

gouaree (gō-ä'rē), n. [E. Ind. (Dekkan).] The Cyamopsis tetragonoloba, a stout, erect leguminous annual, cultivated generally on the plains of India. Its pods and seeds are used as an article of food. Also gowár, gaur.

goud[1] (goud), n. A Scotch form of gold.

goud[2]†, n. [Appar. an error, repr. OF. gaide, waide, dial. vouède, mod. F. guède, woad, q. v.] Woad.

gouf (gouf), v. t. and i. [Origin unknown.] To remove soft earth from under a structure, substituting sods cut square and built regularly; underpin. [Scotch.] Imp. Dict.

gouge (gouj or göj), n. [Formerly also googe; < ME. gowge, < OF. gouge, a gouge, = Pr. gubio = Sp. gubia = Pg. goiva = It. gorbia, < ML. guvia, gubia, also written gulvia, gulbia, a kind of chisel. Origin unknown; perhaps (?) < Basque gubia, a bowl.] 1. A chisel with a longitudinally curved blade, used to cut holes, channels, or grooves in wood or stone, or for turning wood in a lathe.—2. In bookbinding, a gilders' tool intended to make the segment of a circle.—3. A local name for a shell which gouges or cuts the foot when trodden on; specifically, in the Gulf of Mexico, a shell of the genus Pinna or Vermetus.—4. A stamp for cutting leather or paper.—5. In mining, the band or layer of decomposed country rock or clayey material (flucan) often found on each side of a lode. It is so called because it can be easily removed or gouged out with a pick, thus greatly facilitating the removal of the contents of the lode. See selvage and flucan.
6. An effect of gouging; an excavation or a hole made by or as if by scooping out matter. [Colloq.]—7. An imposition; a cheat; also, an impostor. [Colloq., U. S.]

Another gouge was to charge the women a nominally cost price per spool for the thread furnished them, while as a matter of fact it was got wholesale from the manufacturers for considerably less. The American, XIV. 344.

gouge (gouj or göj), v. t.; pret. and pp. gouged, ppr. gouging. [< gouge, n.] 1. To scoop out or turn with a gouge.

I will save in cork,
In my mere stop'ling, above three thousand pound
Within that term; by googing of them out
Just to the size of my bottles, and not slicing.
B. Jonson, Devil is an Ass, ii. 1.

Hence—2. To scoop or excavate as if with a gouge; dig or tear out by or as if by a scooping action: as, to gouge a loaf of bread; to gouge a hole in a garment. [Gouging out the eyes of an antagonist with the thumb or finger has been a practice among brutal fighters in some parts of both Europe and America, but is now probably rare everywhere.

In these encounters [formerly in Norway] such feats as who could first gouge his opponent's eye out were included.
B. Björnson, Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 648.]

3. To cheat in a bold or brutal manner; overreach in a bargain. [Colloq., U. S.]

Very well, gentlemen! gouge Mr.—— out of the seat, if you think it wholesome to do it.
New York Tribune, Nov. 26, 1845.

gouge-bit (gouj'bit), n. A bit shaped like a gouge, with the piercing end sharpened to a semicircular edge for shearing the fibers round the margin of the hole. It removes the wood almost in a solid core. Also called shell-bit and quill-bit.

gouge-chisel (gouj'chiz″el), n. A chisel with a concave cutting edge; a gouge.

gouge-furrow (gouj'fur″ō), n. See furrow.

gouger (gou'jėr or gö'jėr), n. 1. One who gouges or stabs. Davies.—2. An insect that gouges: applied to numberless insects, designated by some specifying term: as, the plum-gouger.—3. The bow oar of a flatboat. [Mississippi river and tributaries.]—4. A cheat. [Colloq., U. S.]

It is true there are gamblers and gougers and outlaws.
Flint, Recollections of the Mississippi, p. 176.

gouge-slip (gouj'slip), n. An oil-stone or hone for sharpening gouges or chisels.

goujeers, goujeres, n. An assumed derivative from the French gouge, a camp-trull, meaning 'venereal disease,' taken as the form of which the phrase good year(s), occurring thrice in Shakspere, is a (supposed) corruption.

Hanmer's spurious form goujeres or goujeers has, however, found its way into many editions of Shakspere and was adopted as the standard form in Johnson's Dict., 1755.
N. E. D., s. 'Good year.'

goujon (gö'jon), n. [= F. goujon, a gudgeon: see gudgeon[1].] The flat-headed or mud catfish, Leptops olivaris, a large fish of the United States interior waters, attaining a weight of 75 pounds.

I have no fear but that the result of our experiment will be, that men may be trusted to govern themselves without a master. Jefferson, Correspondence, II. 174.

3. In gram., to cause or require to be in a particular form: as, a transitive verb or a preposition governs a noun or pronoun in the objective case; the possessive case is governed by the thing possessed; the subject governs the verb in number and person.=Syn. 1 and 2. Rule, Control, Govern, Regulate, Manage; conduct, supervise, guide; command, sway, curb, moderate. Of the first five words, rule is the most general, and is the only one that can stand for the exercise of an arbitrary or a loose kind of sway. Control implies a firm rule, which may not attend to the details of administration, but holds persons in check and prevents things from going in a way not desired: as, to control expenditures; to control fierce tribes. Govern implies the constant use of knowledge and judgment, like the close attention given by a pilot to his wheel. To regulate is to bring under rules, hence to make exact; it is not ordinarily used to express continued action, but it may mean to keep under rule: as, to regulate a watch, one's movements, one's conduct, the administration of a province. Manage enlarges the notion of handling a horse or caring for the affairs of a household to greater things, as a ship, a business, a nation; it implies great attention to details, constant watchfulness, and much skill or at least adroitness; it is rather a small word to be used as a synonym for govern. See guide, v. t., and manage.

II. intrans. To exercise or have control; practise direction or guidance; especially, to exercise legal or customary authority.

To instruct ourselves in all the amazing lessons of God's governing providence, by which he holds the balance of nations, and inclines it which way he pleases.
Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, I. vii.

Your wicked atoms may be working now
To give bad counsel, that you still may govern.
Dryden.

The limits which separate the power of checking those who govern from the power of governing are not easily to be defined. Macaulay, Sir William Temple.

governable (guv'ėr-na-bl), a. [< govern + -able.] Capable of being governed or subjected to authority; controllable; manageable; amenable to law or rule.

The causes of these effects remain unknown, so as not to be governable by human means.
Bacon, Physical Fables, x., Expl. note.

It [the storm] came on very fierce, and we kept right before the wind and sea, the wind still increasing: the ship was very governable and steered incomparably well.
Dampier, Voyages, III., an. 1699.

So little a while ago that face had moved with every change of sentiment, that pale mouth had spoken, that body had been all on fire with governable energies.
R. L. Stevenson, Markheim.

Sydney Smith, in Lady Holland, vii.

governess (guv'ėr-nes), v. [< governess, n.] I. intrans. To play the governess; act as governess: as, to go out governessing. [Colloq.]

"You will give up your governessing slavery at once." "Indeed! begging your pardon, sir, I shall not. I shall go on with it as usual."
Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, xxiv.

II. trans. To control or direct as a governess.

Tutored and governessed out of all the pleasantness of being natural. Contemporary Rev., XLIX. 855.

government (guv'ėrn-ment), n. [Not in ME. (where the equiv. word was governance, q. v.); < OF. governement, gouvernement, F. gouvernement = Pr. governament = OSp. gubernamiento = Pg. It. governamento, < ML. as if gubernamentum,* government, < L. gubernare, govern: see govern and -ment.] 1. Guidance; direction; regulation; management; control: as, the government of one's conduct.

The house of God must have orders for the government of it, such as not any of the household but God himself hath appointed. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, iii. 11.

Thy eyes' windows [shall] fall,
Like death, when he shuts up the day of life;
Each part, depriv'd of supple government,
Shall, stiff, and stark, and cold, appear like death.
Shak., R. and J., iv. 1.

2. The exercise of authority in the administration of the affairs of a state, community, or society; the authoritative direction and restraint exercised over the actions of men in communities, societies, or states.

Why has government been instituted at all? Because the passions of men will not conform to the dictates of reason and justice without constraint.
A. Hamilton, Federalist, No. 15.

Man is so constituted that government is necessary to the existence of society, and society to his existence, and the perfection of his faculties. Calhoun, Works, I. 4.

Government exists for the purpose of keeping the peace, for the purpose of compelling us to settle our disputes by arbitration instead of settling them by blows, for the purpose of compelling us to supply our wants by industry instead of supplying them by rapine.
Macaulay, Disabilities of Jews.

3. The system of polity or body of principles and rules by which the affairs of a state, community, or society are administered; an established or prescribed method of guiding, directing, or managing affairs: as, representative or constitutional government; monarchical or republican government; the presbyterian, episcopal, or congregational form of church government.

The government of the United States is a limited government, instituted for great national purposes, and for those only. T. H. Benton, Thirty Years, I. 25.

4. The governing body of persons in a state or community; the executive power; the administration. In Great Britain government is used specifically to signify the cabinet or ministry, apart from the sovereign; and in speaking of any joint action of this body the article is often omitted: as, the Liberal government was defeated by a large majority; government brought in a bill.

The Cabinet, the body to which in common use we have latterly come to give the name of Government, is simply a body of those privy councillors who are specially summoned. Encyc. Brit., VIII. 297.

5. A state or body politic governed by one authority; a province or division of territory ruled by a governor. Specifically—(a) One of the military divisions of France before the revolution. (b) In Russia, a province or governorship: as, the government of Perm.

For the purposes of territorial administration Russia Proper . . . is divided into forty-six provinces or Governments (gubernii). D. M. Wallace, Russia, p. 198.

6. Right of governing; administrative authority; the office or function of one charged with the direction and control of affairs.

Warwick, . . .
I here resign my government to thee,
For thou art fortunate in all thy deeds.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., iv. 6.

7†. Conduct or behavior; self-control or restraint.

Yet oftentimes it doth present harsh rage,
Defect of manners, want of government,
Pride, haughtiness, opinion, and disdain.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., iii. 1.

How did the University applaud
Thy government, behaviour, learning, speech,
Sweetness, and all that could make up a man!
Ford, 'Tis Pity, i. 1.

8. In gram., the established usage which requires that one word in a sentence should cause another to be of a particular form; grammatical regimen.

governmental (guv-ėrn-men'tal), a. [< government + -al.] Of or pertaining to government or the government; given, made, or issued by the government: as, governmental interference with trade; governmental order; governmental policy.

Upon the accession of the Hanoverian dynasty, however, Governmental encouragement of literature almost absolutely ceased. Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., iii.

There is no more possibility of intervention, or of governmental aid. Contemporary Rev., LII. 731.

Governmental theory of the atonement. See atonement, 3 (a).

governor (guv'ėr-nor), n. [Also governour; < ME. governor, usually governour, < OF. governeor, governour, governur, gouvernour, gouverneur, F. gouverneur = Pr. governador = Sp. gobernador = Pg. governador = It. governatore, < L. gubernator, a steersman, pilot, director, governor, < gubernare, steer, pilot, direct: see govern, v.] 1†. A steersman; a pilot.

Behold also the ships, which though they be so great, and are driven of fierce winds, yet are they turned about with a very small helm, whithersoever the governor listeth. Jas. iii. 4.

2. The person invested with the supreme executive power in a state or community; specifically, as a personal title, the chief magistrate of a state or province: as, the governor of Connecticut; the governor of Newfoundland. As a title, abbreviated Gov.

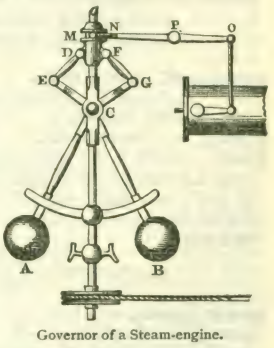
Her grace [Queen Elizabeth] likewise on her side, in al her graces passage, shewed herselfe generallye an image of a worthy lady and gouernour.
Fabyan, Chron., an. 1559.

To-day the Governor is everywhere chosen by the people directly, instead of through the Legislature; his term has generally been much lengthened.
Johns Hopkins Hist. Studies, III. 477.

3. One who is charged with the direction or control of an undertaking or institution: as, the governors of the Bank of England; the governor of a prison or hospital.

Therle of Northumberland should be chefetaine and supreme gouernour of the armie. Hall, Hen. IV., an. 6.

Out of Machir came down governors, and out of Zebulun they that handle the pen of the writer. Judges v. 14.



These seven angels are, by antiquity, called the seven governors or bishops of the seven churches.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 160.

4. A tutor; one who has the care of a young man; one who instructs a pupil and forms his manners. Compare governess, 2. [Obsolete or rare.]

And thus by the Chylde yee shall perceiue the disposytion of the Gouernour. Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 63.

The great work of a governour is to fashion the carriage and form the mind. Locke, Education, § 94.

5. A father; a master or superior; an employer; an elderly person. [Slang.]—6. In mach., a self-acting regulator which controls a supply of steam, gas, or water; especially, any device for automatically regulating the amount of power developed in a machine, as in a steam-engine. Governors are made in a variety of forms and with different methods of action. A form of governor for the steam-engine which illustrates well the general function of such devices is shown in the annexed figure. It represents a spindle kept in motion by the engine. A and B are two centrifugal balls, C A and C B the rods which suspend the balls, crossing each other and passing through the spindle at C, where the whole is connected by a round pin put through the spindle and the rods, and serving as the point of suspension for the centrifugal balls or revolving pendulums. A piece of brass, M, is fitted to slide up and down upon the upper part of the spindle, and to this piece the end of the lever N O, whose fulcrum is at P, is attached. This piece of brass is also connected with the ball-rods by two short pieces and joints, D E, F G. When the engine goes too fast, the balls fly further asunder and depress the end N of the lever, which partly shuts a throttle-valve connected with the end O, and thus diminishes the quantity of steam admitted into the cylinder; and on the other hand, when the engine goes too slowly, the balls fall down toward the spindle and elevate the end N of the lever, which opens the throttle-valve wider, and increases the quantity of steam admitted into the cylinder, thus causing it to be proportioned to the resistance of the engine, and keeping the variation of velocity within narrow limits. The more modern forms of governor control the distribution of the steam to the two ends of the cylinder by acting directly upon the valve-gear. They are often applied directly on the engine-shaft. A similar contrivance is employed in mills to equalize the motion of the machinery. See gas-governor.—Atmospheric, chronometric, etc., governor. See the adjectives.—Electric governor, in mach.: (a) A governor in which the spread of revolving balls or the spread of the rim of a wheel by centrifugal action may act as a circuit-closer and sound an alarm or control some other part of the mechanism. (b) The regulator used in arc-lamps to control the current. See regulator.—Governors' Act, an English statute of 1699 (11 and 12 William III., c. 12), making governors, their deputies, etc., of plantations beyond sea answerable in England for crimes committed within such plantations. —Governor's council. See council.—Gyroscope governor. See gyroscope.—Marine governor, a governor for marine engines intended to overcome the effects of the motion of a vessel on a governor of ordinary construction. Many such governors have been invented, in which the centrifugal balls are replaced by other contrivances.—Screw-propeller governor, a form of governor in which the throttle-valve is regulated by the action of a screw-propeller device working in a resisting fluid.

Days of grace. (a) In old Eng. law, days granted by the court for delay at the prayer of the plaintiff or defendant; three days beyond the day named in the writ, in which the person summoned might appear and answer. (b) The period beyond the fixed day for payment allowed by law or custom for paying a negotiable note or bill of exchange. In Great Britain and the United States, at common law, three days are allowed; but if the last day of grace falls on Sunday, or any day on which business is not legally carried on, the bill or note is payable on the day preceding. Modern statutes have made some changes in these rules, particularly as regards legal holidays immediately preceding or following Sunday. Bankers' checks are payable on demand without days of grace, and the same rule applies to bills or notes payable on demand.—Economy or dispensation of grace, the system or method according to which God dispenses his free gifts, especially his spiritual gifts, to man.—Good graces, favor; friendship.

What has the merchant done, that he should be so little in the good graces of Sir Roger?
Steele, Spectator, No. 174.

Indwelling grace, grace operating on the believer as a sanctifying power.—Irresistible grace, grace independent of and irresistible by the human will. According to some theologians, grace in conversion is irresistible; according to others, coöperant.—Means of grace, the means by which divine influence is exerted on the hearts of men, such as the preaching of the gospel, the reading of Scripture, prayer, meditation, public worship, and the sacraments of the church.

We bless thee . . . for the means of grace, and for the hope of glory.
Book of Common Prayer, General Thanksgiving.

Operations of grace, the sanctifying influences ascribed in the Scriptures to the Holy Spirit.—Prevenient grace, grace which acts upon the sinner before repentance.—Saving grace, those spiritual gifts which are essential to or constitute salvation.—To fall from grace, to lose the spiritual gifts conferred in conversion, and relapse into a state of apostasy and sin. Arminianism affirms, Calvinism denies, the possibility of falling from grace.—To take heart of grace (formerly also at grace or a grace [sometimes written grasse and confused with grass]), to take courage because of favor or indulgence shown.

And with that she drinking delivered me the glasse, I now taking heart at grasse to see her so gamesome, as merilie as I could, pledged her in this manner.
Lyly, Euphues and his England, sig. H, 2 b.

What it was, after I had eaten a little heart a grasse, which grew at my feete, I feared not, and who was the owner I greatly cared not, but boldly accosted him, and desired house-roome. The Man in the Moone (1609).

Then spake Achilles swift of pace,
"Fear not" (quoth he), "take heart of grace,
What e're thou hast to say, be 't best or Worst, speake it out, thou son of Thestor."
Homer a la Mode (1665).

With a bad grace, ungracefully; ungraciously; with evident reluctance, inappropriateness, or insincerity: as, the apology was made with a bad grace.—With a good grace, gracefully; graciously: now generally implying that the air of graciousness is rather forced: as, he made reparation with a good grace.

He does it with a better grace, but I do it more natural.
Shak., T. N., ii. 3.

No man discharges pecuniary obligations with a better grace than my father. Sterne, Tristram Shandy, iii. 33.

The methods of grafting are of great variety, designated by the words whip, splice, cleft, saddle, crown, etc. In whip-grafting, or tongue-grafting, the stock and scion, of equal size, are fitted together by tongues cut in each, and tightly bound (whipped or lashed) until they are well united in growth. Splice-grafting is performed by cutting the ends of the scion and stock completely across in an oblique direction, then laying the oblique surfaces together so that the one exactly fits the other, and securing them by tying or otherwise. In cleft-grafting the stock is cleft down, and the graft, cut in the shape of a wedge at its lower end, is inserted into the cleft. In saddle-grafting the end of the stock is cut in the form of a wedge, and the base of the scion, slit up or cleft for the purpose, is affixed. In crown-grafting the graft is made at the crown or surface of the ground. Rind-grafting is performed by cutting the lower end of the scion in a sloping direction, while the head of the stock is cut over horizontally and a slit is made through the inner bark; a piece of wood, bone, ivory, or other such substance, resembling the thinned end of the scion, is inserted in the top of the slit between the alburnum and the inner bark and pushed down in order to raise the bark, so that the thin end of the scion may be introduced without being bruised; the edges of the bark on each side are then brought close to the scion, and the whole is bound with matting and clayed.

2. In carp., the joining of two piles or beams endwise; scarfing.—Grafting by approach. Same as approaching.

Graham bread. See brown bread, under bread[1].

Grahamism (grā'am-izm), n. [< Graham (Sylvester Graham, an American reformer and writer on dietetics (1794–1851)) + -ism.] Vegetarianism. [U. S.]

Grahamism was advocated and practiced by many.
N. Y. Med. Jour., XL 567.

Grahamite[1] (grā'am-īt), n. [See Grahamism.] A follower of Sylvester Graham in respect to diet; a vegetarian. [U. S.]

★grahamite[2] (grā'am-īt), n. [Named after J. Lorimer Graham of New York, and Col. Graham of Baltimore.] A bituminous mineral resembling albertite, filling a fissure in sandstone in W. Virginia: also found elsewhere.

graid, graidly. Same as graith, graithly.

grail[1]† (grāl), n. [< ME. grayle, grayel, grale = OD. gral, < OF. grael, greel, graal, greil, gree, a service-book (cf. gracl, greal, a degree) (F. graduel = Pr. Sp. Pg. gradual = It. graduale), < ML. graduale, also gradale, a service-book, a gradual: see gradual, n., 2.] Same as gradual, 2.

Others do say that Gelasius ordained the grail to be had in the mass about the year of our Lord 490.
J. Bradford, Works (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 306.

In the Graduale, or Grail, was put whatever the choir took any part in singing, on Sundays or festivals, at high mass. Rock, Church of our Fathers, III. ii. 212.

grail[2] (grāl), n. [Early mod. E. grayle; < ME. graal (= MHG. grāl, grazal, gresal, G. graal, gral), etc., < OF. graal, greal, greail, greel, greil, also in the general sense grasal, F. dial. grazal, grazau, grial, grau, gro = Pr. grazal = OCat. gresal = OSp. grial = Pg. gral, in ML. variously gradalis, gradale, grasale, grasala, a flat dish, a shallow vessel; the forms show unusual variation, being appar. manipulated on account of the legendary associations of the word (so OF. saint greal, 'holy dish,' was manipulated into sang real, prop. 'royal blood,' but taken for 'real blood,' ML. sanguis realis), and the original form is not certain; it was prob. gradalis, pointing to a probable corruption (simulating gradale, a service-book, a gradual, also an antiphon, etc.: see grail[1]) of ML. cratella, dim. of crater, a bowl: see crater.] In medieval legend, the platter (also taken as a cup or chalice) called the holy grail or sangreal, imagined to have been of emerald, used by Christ at the last supper, and in which Joseph of Arimathea was said to have caught the last drops of Christ's blood as he was taken from the cross. By Joseph, according to one account, it was carried to Britain. Other accounts affirm that it was brought by angels from heaven and intrusted to a body of knights, who guarded it on the top of a mountain; when approached by any one not perfectly pure it vanished from sight. The grail having been lost, it became the great object of search or quest for knights errant of all nations, none being qualified to discover it but a knight perfectly chaste in thought and act. The stories and poems concerning Arthur and the Knights of the Round Table are founded on this legend, and it has been still further developed in modern times. See sangreal.

And, sir, the peple that were ther-at cleped this vessell that thei hadden in so grete grace the Graal; and yef ye do my counseile, ye shall stablisshe the thirde table in the name of the trinite.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), i. 59.

All-arm'd I ride, whate'er betide,
Until I find the holy Grail.
Tennyson, Sir Galahad.

grail[3]† (grāl), n. [As used by Spenser (def. 1), spelled graile, grayle, and appar. regarded by him as a contr. of gravel; but in all senses appar. ult. < OF. graile, graille, later gresle, F. grêle, fine, small (< L. gracilis, slender, thin: see gracile), confused with OF. gresle, F. grêle, hail (cf. F. grésil = Pr. grazil, sleet), < OF. gres, F. grès, grit, < OHG. grioz, G. gries = AS. greót, E. grit: see grit[2].] 1. Fine gravel; sand.

Hereof this gentle knight unweeting was;
And lying downe upon the sandie graile
Dronke of the streame as cleare as christall glas:
Eftsoones his manly forces gan to fayle,
And mightie strong was turned to feeble frayle.
Spenser, F. Q., I. vii. 6.

But, when as he would to a snake againe
Have turn'd himselfe, he with his yron flayle
Gan drive at him with so huge might and maine,
His bones as small as sandy grayle
He broke, and did his bowels disentrayle.
Spenser, F. Q., V. ix. 19.

2. One of the smaller feathers of a hawk. Blome.

grail[4] (grāl), n. [Cf. grail[3].] A single-cut file with one curved and one straight face, used by comb-makers.

grail[4] (grāl), v. t. [< grail[4], n.] In comb-making, to treat with a single-cut file or grail.

They [combs] then pass to the grailing department, where, by means of special forms of files or rasps, known as grails and topers, the individual teeth are rounded or bevelled, tapered, and smoothed. Encyc. Brit., VI. 178.

★grain[1] (grān), n. [Early mod. E. also graine, grayn, grayne, etc.; < ME. grayn, usually greyn, grein, a grain of wheat, etc., of sand, etc., a seed, grain (of paradise), a pearl, grain of the skin, etc., < OF. grain, grein = Pr. gran, gra = Sp. grano = Pg. grão = It. grano, a grain, seed, = D. graan, grain, corn, = G. In sense 11, < ME. grayne, greyne, a red dye, a texture dyed red, = MHG. grān, a red dye, < OF. graine, grainne, greinne, etc., = Pr. Sp. Pg. It. grana, f., coccus, a red dye, < ML. grana, f., prop. neut. pl., 'grains,' in reference to the insects collectively, pl. of L. granum, a grain.] 1. A small hard seed; specifically, a seed of one of the cereal plants, wheat, rye, oats, barley, maize, or millet; a corn.

Eke Marcial affermeth oute of doute
That greynes white in hem [pomegranates] this crafte will die. Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 116.

The graine of it [Panicke] is almost as great as a beane. Coryat, Crudities, I. 103.

2. Collectively, corn in general; the gathered seeds of cereal plants in mass; also, the plants themselves, whether standing or gathered: as, to grind or thresh grain; a field or a stack of grain.

Loke what is in the fyrst fruites of grayne offered, the same is generally in the whole heape. J. Udall, On Col. i.

And champing golden grain, the horses stood Hard by their chariots waiting for the dawn.
Tennyson, Iliad, viii. 560.

3. The smallest unit of weight in most systems, originally determined by the weight of a plump grain of wheat. In a pound troy or apothecaries' weight there are 5,760 grains, the grain being the 24th part of a pennyweight in the former and the 20th part of a scruple in the latter. The ounce of each therefore contains 480 grains, while in avoirdupois weight, in which the grain is not used, the ounce is equal to 437½ grains and the pound to 7,000 grains. Abbreviated gr.

4. Any small hard particle, as of sand, gunpowder, sugar, salt, etc.; hence, a minute portion of anything; the smallest amount of anything: as, he has not a grain of wit.

And for no carpyng I couth after ne knelyng to the grounde, I myzte gete no greyne of his grete wittis.
Piers Plowman (B), x. 139.

Arth. Is there no remedy?
Hub. None but to lose your eyes.
Arth. O heaven!—that there were but a mote in yours, A grain, a dust, a gnat, a wandering hair.
Shak., K. John, iv. 1.

Love's too precious to be lost,
A little grain shall not be spilt.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, lxv.

5. In bot., a grain-like prominence or tubercle, as upon the sepals of dock.—6. pl. The husks or remains of malt after brewing, or of any grain after distillation. It is used as feed for domestic animals: in the United States, for cows, which eat it greedily, but whose milk is made thinner and less nutritious by it, though temporarily increased in quantity, while the animal is soon materially injured.

7. The quality of a substance due to the size, character, or arrangement of its grains or particles, as its coarseness or fineness, or superficial roughness or smoothness; granular texture: as, a stone or salt of coarse grain; marble or sugar of fine grain.

The compass heaven, smooth without grain or fold,
All set with spangs of glitt'ring stars untold.
Bacon, Paraphrase of Psalm civ.

The tooth of a sea-horse contains a curdled grain.
Sir T. Browne.

In any process of photograph engraving in half tones it is absolutely necessary to produce what is termed a grain, so as to obtain an ink-holding surface, and giving detail in the shadows. Sci. Amer. Supp., p. 8972.

8. Fibrous texture or constitution, especially of wood; the substance of wood as modified by the quality, arrangement, or direction of its fibers: as, boxwood has a very compact grain; wood of a gnarled grain; to plane wood with, against, or across the grain.

When any side of it was cut smooth and polite, it appeared to have a very lovely grain, like that of some curious close wood. Evelyn, Forest Trees, xxx. § 12.

Then what were left of roughness in the grain
Of British natures . . . would disgust.
Cowper, Task, v. 480.

The crushed petals' lovely grain.
D. G. Rossetti, Jenny.

The middle of the blade [of whalebone] is of a looser texture than the rest, and is called the grain, being composed of coarse, bristly hairs.
Workshop Receipts, 1st ser., p. 362.

Hence—9. Intimate structure or character; intrinsic or essential quality.

The one being tractable and mild, the other stiff and impatient of a superior, they lived but in cunning concord, as brothers glued together, but not united in grain.
Hayward.

My father, as I told you, was a philosopher in grain, speculative, systematical. Sterne, Tristram Shandy, i. 21.

10†. A spice: same as grains of paradise (which see, below).

First he cheweth greyn and lycoris,
To smellen swete.
Chaucer, Miller's Tale, l. 504.

Ther was eke wexyng many a spice,
As clowe-gelofre, and lycorice, Gyngevre, and greyn de paris [orig. F., graine de paradis].
Rom. of the Rose, l. 1369.

11. (a) One of the grain-like insects of the genus Coccus, as C. polonicus or C. ilicis, which yield a scarlet dye; later, especially, cochineal; the product of the Coccus cacti; kermes: so called from the granular appearance of the dried insects. See cut under cochineal. Hence—(b) A red-colored dye; a red color of any kind pervading the texture: sometimes used as equivalent to Tyrian purple. (c) Any fast color. See in grain, below.

Coarse complexions,
And cheeks of sorry grain, will serve to ply
The sampler, and to tease the huswife's wool.
Milton, Comus, l. 750.

Over his lucid arms
A military vest of purple flow'd, Livelier than Melibœan, or the grain
Of Sarra. Milton, P. L., xi. 242.

12. The side of leather from which the hair has been removed, showing the fibrous texture.

The part from which the "split" is taken, called the grain, is shaved on a beam with a currier's knife.
C. T. Davis, Leather, p. 514.

13. In mining, cleat or cleavage.—14. pl. A solution of birds' dung used in leather-manufacture to counteract the effects of lime and make the leather soft and flexible.—Against the grain. (a) Against the fibers of the wood. Hence—(b) Against the natural temper; contrary to desire or feeling.

Your minds
Pre-occupied with what you rather must do Than what you should, made you against the grain
To voice him consul. Shak., Cor., ii. 3.

Quoth Hudibras, "It is in vain
(I see) to argue 'gainst the grain."
S. Butler, Hudibras, II. ii. 478.

Black in the grain. See black in the flesh, under black. —Brewers' grains. Same as draff. See also def. 6.—Grains of paradise, the seeds of Amomum Melegueta and A. Granum-Paradisi, two zingiberaceous plants of western tropical Africa. They are feebly aromatic and have a very pungent and burning taste, and are used as a constituent in some cattle-powders, and especially to give pungency to cordials. They are also known as guinea-grains or melegueta pepper, and were an ingredient in the hippocras or spiced wine of the middle ages.

Look at that rough o' a boy gaun . . . into the ginshop, to buy beer poisoned wi' grains o' paradise and cocculus indicus. Kingsley, Alton Locke, viii.

In grain. [OF. en graine.] (a†) With the scarlet dye obtained from insects of the genus Coccus. (b) With any fast dye; in fast colors: as, to dye in grain.

How the red roses flush up in her cheekes,
And the pure snow, with goodly vermill stayne
Like crimsin dyde in grayne.
Spenser, Epithalamion, l. 228.

Oli. 'Tis in grain, sir; 'twill endure wind and weather.
Vio. 'Tis beauty truly blent, whose red and white Nature's own sweet and cunning hand laid on.
Shak., T. N., i. 5.

Our reason is first stained and spotted with the dye of our kindred and country, and our education puts it in grain. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 683.

(c) See def. 9.—To break the grain. See break.—To ★dye in grain. See in grain (b).

grain[1] (grān), v. [< ME. greynen; from the noun.] I. intrans. 1†. To bring forth grain; yield fruit.

It floureth, but it shal not greyne
Unto the fruite of rightwisnesse.
Gower, Conf. Amant., v.

2. To form grains or assume a granular form; crystallize into grains, as sugar.

II. trans. 1†. To produce, as from a seed.

Certes all maner linage of men been euen liche in birth, for one father maker of all goodnes informed hem al, and all mortal folke of one seed are greined.
Testament of Love, ii.

2. In brewing, to free from grain; separate the grain from, as wort.

The graining of wort from wheat is difficult on account of the tenacious layer of grains.
Thausing, Beer (trans.), p. 198.

3. To form into grains, as powder, sugar, and the like.—4. To paint, etc., so as to give the appearance of grain or fibers of wood.—5. In tanning, to take the hair off of; soften and raise the grain of: as, to grain skins or leather.—6. To dye in grain.

Persons lightly dipped, not grained in generous honesty, are but pale in goodness.
Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., i. 9.

Kermes, like cochineal, were supposed to be berries or grains, and colors dyed with them were said to be grained, or engrained.
O'Neill, Dyeing and Calico Printing, p. 302.

grain[2] (grān), n. [< Icel. grein, the branch of a tree, a branch, arm, point, difference, = Sw. gren, branch, arm, stride, fork, = Dan. gren, branch, bough, prong. Doublet, groin[2], q. v.] 1. A tine, prong, or spike. See grain-staff, 1.—2. The fork of a tree or of a stick.—3. The groin.

Then Corin up doth take
The Giant twixt the grayns.
Drayton, Polyolbion, i. 495.

4. A piece of sheet-metal used in a mold to hold in position an additional part, as a core. Also called chapelet and gagger.—5. pl. An iron instrument with four or more barbed points, and a line attached to it, used at sea for striking and taking fish. In the United States these fish-spears are made in many patterns, with different numbers of prongs or barbs, sometimes only one prong and a half-barb. They oftenest have two prongs, each half-barbed inwardly. They are used for turtles as well as fish. Among seamen the plural is commonly used as a singular.

Grains with Five Prongs.

Another amusement we sometimes indulged in was "burning the water" for craw-fish. For this purpose we procured a pair of grains, with a long staff like a harpoon, . . . making torches with tarred rope twisted round a long pine stick.
R. H. Dana, Jr., Before the Mast, p. 191.

6. pl. A place at which two streams unite; the fork of a river.

The survey of 1542 describes the Redesdale men as living in sheels during the summer months, and pasturing their cattle in the grains and hopes of the country on the south side of the Coquet, about Wilkwood and Ridlees.

Hodgson, Northumberland (1827), quoted in Ribton-[Turner's Vagrants and Vagrancy, p. 86.

grain[3] (grān), v. and n. A dialectal (Scotch) form of groan.

grainage (grā′nāj), n. [Formerly granage: < grain[1] + -age.] 1. Duties on grain.—2. An old duty in London, consisting of a twentieth part of the salt imported by aliens.—3. In farriery, certain mangy tumors which sometimes form on the legs of horses.

grain-alcohol (grān′al″kọ̄-hol), n. See alcohol, 1.

grain-binder (grān′bīn″dėr), n. The binding attachment of a harvester or reaper, for tying the gavels of grain into sheaves. See harvester.

grain-bruiser (grān′brö″zėr), n. A mill for crushing or cracking grain, used in preparing feed for cattle; a bruising-mill. It consists simply of two iron rolls of different diameters, moving together to give a rubbing and crushing action to the grain which passes between them.

grain-car (grān′kär), n. A box railroad-car with tight inside doors, adapted for the transportation of grain in bulk. Car-Builder's Dict.

grain-cradle (grān′krā″dl), n. A cradle for cutting grain. See cradle, n., 4 (f).

grain-door (grān′dōr), n. A close-fitting movable door on the inside of a box-car, by which the lower part of the door-opening is closed, when the car is loaded with grain in bulk, to prevent leakage. Car-Builder's Dict.

grain-dryer (grān′drī″ėr), n. An apparatus for drying grain when from any cause it has become damp, and to prepare it for shipment. Many different forms of dryers are employed, as conveyors, traveling belts, revolving pans, stirring appliances, and tubes filled with deflectors. In all it is the aim to keep the grain in constant motion, and to expose it in thin films or streams to currents of heated air. Similar machines are used to dry spent malt.

graine (grān), n. [F., a seed, grain: see grain[1].] The eggs of the silkworm.

The eggs of the silkworm, called graine, are hatched out by artificial heat at the period when the mulberry leaves are ready for the feeding of the larvæ.
Encyc. Brit., XXII. 58.

grained (grānd), p. a. [Pp. of grain[1], v.] 1†. Rough; roughened.

Though now this grained face of mine be hid
In sap-consuming winter's drizzled snow.
Shak., C. of E., v. 1.

2†. Dyed in grain; ingrained.

Thou turn'st mine eyes into my very soul;
And there I see such black and grained spots,
As will not leave their tinct. Shak., Hamlet, iii. 4.

3. Painted as having a grain.—4. Formed or divided into grains or small particles.—5. In bot., having grain-like tubercles or prominences, as the sepals in some species of Rumex.—6. Characterized by a fibrous texture or grain.

Let me twine
Mine arms about that body, where against My grained ash an hundred times hath broke,
And scar'd the moon with splinters!
Shak., Cor., iv. 5.

Grained leather. Same as grain-leather.

grainel†, n. [Cf. Sc. girnel; var. forms of grain-er, granary, etc.] A granary. Nares.

grainer[1] (grā′nėr), n. 1. One who paints in imitation of the grain of wood.—2. The peculiar brush or toothed instrument which a painter employs in graining. Also called graining-tool.—3. A lixivium obtained by infusing pigeons' dung in water, used by tanners to give flexibility to skins.—4. A knife used by tanners and skinners for taking the hair off of skins.

grainer[2]†, n. [Cf. graner, granier; var. forms of garner, granary.] A garner. Davies.

He wyll brynge the wheate into hys barne or grayner.
Bp. Bale, Enterlude of Johan Bapt., 1538 [(Harl. Misc., I. 110).

grainering (grā′nėr-ing), n. [< grainer[1], 3, + -ing[1].] Same as bating[3].

grainery (grā′nėr-i), n.; pl. graineries (-iz). [< grain + -ery; an accom. form of granary.] A granary. [Rare.]

The houses consist . . . of the grainery, where we keep the rice . . . [and] the Indian corn, etc.
Livingstone's Life Work.

graining[1] (grā′ning), n. [Verbal n. of grain[1], v.] The act or process of producing a grain or a grained or fibrous appearance on the surface of a material; the appearance so produced. Specifically—(a) The milling of a coin.

Mr. Lowndes tells us that the engines which put the letters upon the edges of the large silver pieces, and mark the edges of the rest with a graining, are wrought secretly.
Locke, Further Considerations concerning Money.

It is called by some the unmilled guinea, as having no graining upon the rim. Leake.

(b) In painting, the act or process of producing an imitation of the color and arrangement of the grain or fibers of wood; the appearance so produced. (c) The act of grinding lithographic stones together with fine sand to give a certain mat or grain to the surface. (d) In leather-making, the artificial markings on the surface of a skin to imitate morocco and other varieties of leather. (e) In bookbinding, the making of a rough or fine pebbled surface, or a wrinkled or striated surface, on leather used for binding books. (f) In watch-making, a similar process applied to the surface of movements, etc.—Graining-colors. See color.

graining[2] (grā′ning), n. [< grain[2] + -ing[1].] 1. The fork of a tree. [Prov. Eng.]—2. The method or practice of taking fish with grains. See grain[2].

graining[3] (grā′ning), n. [Origin uncertain.] A cyprinoid fish, Leuciscus lancastriensis, found in England, especially in the Mersey and its tributaries.

graining-board (grā′ning-bōrd), n. A piece of hard wood about a foot in length and 4 or 5 inches in breadth, used in raising the grain of leather. The under side of it is somewhat curved in the direction of the length, so that it is thickest in the middle. Also called crippler.

graining-plate (grā′ning-plāt), n. A plate of copper engraved with a pattern which is transferred to damp leather by pressure.

graining-tool (grā′ning-töl), n. Same as grainer[1], 2.

grain-leather (grān′leᴛʜ″ėr), n. Light leather made from side-leather, that is, from half of a cow-hide.

grain-mill (grān′mil), n. A mill for grinding grain; a grist-mill.

grain-moth (grān′môth), n. 1. A small tineid moth, Tinea granella, whose larvæ or grubs devour grain in granaries. These moths have narrow, fringed wings of a satiny luster.—2. The fly-weevil, Sitotroga cerealella. [South. U. S.]

grain-oil (grān′oil), n. Same as fusel-oil.

grain-scale (grān′skāl), n. A self-acting weighing and counting machine used in elevators for weighing grain of all kinds and recording the total amount weighed.

grainsman (grānz′man), n.; pl. grainsmen (-men). One who uses grains to strike fish.

grain-soap (grān′sōp), n. In soap-making, soap in a nearly solid condition, so that it will scarcely receive an impression from the finger.

grain-staff (grān′staf), n. 1†. A quarter-staff with a pair of short tines at the end. Halliwell.—2. The bough of a tree. Grose. [Prov. Eng.]

grain-tin (grān′tin), n. In mining, the purest and finest white tin, smelted with charcoal, which never had any brood or foreign admixture in the mine. Pryce, 1778. [Cornwall.]

grain-tree (grān′trē), n. In her., a plant represented with large green leaves and bunches of red berries at the top, taken as emblematic of the plant from which the grains called kermes were supposed to come: used as a bearing, as by the Dyers' Company of London.

grain-weevil (grān′wē″vl), n. A rhynchophorous coleopteran or snout-beetle of the genus Calandra (or Sitophilus) and family Calandridæ, which injures stored cereals. See Calandra, 2, and weevil.

grain-wheel (grān′hwēl), n. The outer supporting wheel at the end of the finger-bar of a harvester. See harvester.

grainy (grā′ni), a. [< grain[1] + -y[1].] Full of grains or corn; full of kernels.

We watched the emmet to her grainy nest. Rogers.

graip[1] (grāp), v. A Scotch form of grope.

graip[2] (grāp), n. [= Sw. grepe = Dan. greb, a dung-fork; cf. graip[1], v.] A dung-fork. [Scotch.]

The graip he for a harrow tak's. Burns, Halloween.

Graip? . . . That is what we call a three- or four-pronged fork in my country.

Grallæ (gral′ē), n. pl. [L., stilts, pl. of gralla*, contr. of gradla*, < gradi, go, walk: see grade[1].] 1. The fourth Linnean order of birds; the Grallæ.—1, Stork; 2, Heron; 3, Crane.

waders, including forms now dispersed in several orders.—2. In Merrem's classification, the larger and chiefly altricial grallatorial birds, such as herons, ibises, storks, and spoonbills, and also præcocial forms, such as the cranes.—3. An ordinal or other group of wading birds, variously restricted. The term has been transmitted from a former stage of ornithology, and no one has succeeded in defining it with precision. It is often discarded, the waders that had been placed in it being then distributed in three groups, called Limicolæ, the præcocial shore-birds; Herodiones, the altricial waders, as herons, storks, and ibises; and Alectorides or Paludicolæ, the præcocial wading birds, like cranes, rails, and their allies. When the name Grallæ is retained, it usually covers the first and third of these groups, and may be briefly said to correspond to the præcocial wading birds. These are an extensive and varied series of about 20 families. The plovers, Charadriidæ, and the snipes, Scolopacidæ, are the largest of these families; and more or less nearly related to these schizorhinal charadriomorphs are the Chionididæ, or sheathbills; the Thinocoridæ, or lark-plovers; the Glareolidæ, or pratincoles; the Dromadidæ, or crab-plovers; the Hæmatopodidæ, or oyster-catchers; the Jacanidæ or Parridæ, the jaçanas; the Recurvirostridæ, or avosets and stilts; and the Phalaropodidæ, or phalaropes. A pair of holorhinal families of Grallæ are the Œdicnemidæ, or thick-knees, and the Otididæ, or bustards. The remarkable gralline genera Eurypyga, Rhinochetus, and Mesites are types respectively of three families. The remaining præcocial gralline families are the Gruidæ and Rallidæ, or cranes and rails, with which are now associated the Aramidæ, Psophiidæ, and Cariamidæ. See the family names.

Grallaria (gra-lā′ri-ạ), n. [NL., < L. grallæ, stilts (see Grallæ), + -aria.] A genus of formicarian passerine birds, a leading group of Grallaria rex.

South American ant-thrushes, represented by such species as G. varia and G. rex: so named from the great relative length of the legs. Vieillot, 1816.

Grallator (gra-lā′tọr), n. [NL., < L. grallator, one who walks on stilts, < grallæ, stilts: see Grallæ.] A genus of gigantic animals, formerly supposed to be birds, now believed to be dinosaurian reptiles, known by their footprints in the Triassic formation of the Connecticut valley. Hitchcock, 1858.

Grallatores (gral-ạ-tō′rēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Grallator.] 1. An order or other large group of wading birds, synonymous with Grallæ in any of its senses. [Little used.]—2. In Bonaparte's dichotomous physiological classification of birds, a subclass of Aves (the other subclass being called Insessores), containing those birds the young of which are hatched clothed and able to run about. As the term had before been used in a very different sense, it was afterward changed by its author to Præcoces, and contrasted with Altrices. It corresponds with Sundevall's Ptilopædes.

grallatorial (gral-ạ-tō′ri-ạl), a. [< grallatory + -al.] Pertaining to the Grallatores or wading birds; wading; long-legged, like a wader.

grallatory (gral′ạ-tō-ri), a. [< L. grallator, one who walks on stilts: see Grallator.] Same as grallatorial. [Rare.]

grallic (gral′ik), a. [< Grallæ + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the Grallæ; gralline. [Rare.]

Grallina (gra-lī′nạ), n. [NL. (Vieillot, 1816), < L. grallæ, stilts: see Grallæ.] 1. A genus of oscine passerine birds, variously located in the ornithological system, lately placed in a family called Prionopidæ. The pied grallina, G. picata, inhabits Australia. It is entirely black and white, and 11 inches long. A second species, G. bruijni, is found in the Arfak mountains of New Guinea. Also called Tanypus and Grallipes.

2. [l. c.] A species of this genus: as, the pied grallina.

gralline (gral′in), a. [< Grallæ + -ine.] Of or pertaining to the Grallæ; grallatorial.

The large order of the Charadriornithes has split into aquatic and gralline types. Nature, XXXIX. 180.

Grallipes (gral′i-pēz), n. Same as Grallina, 1. Sundevall, 1873.

gralloch, grallock (gral′ọk), n. [Origin obscure.] The offal of a deer.

gralloch, grallock (gral′ọk), v. t. [< gralloch, grallock, n.] To remove the offal from, as deer.

In the stomach of a stag which was shot in the Duke of Portland's forest at Langwell, Caithness-shire, there were found when gralloched the brass ends of thirteen cartridges. St. James's Gazette, 1888.

gram[2], gramme (gram), n. [= D. Dan. Sw. gram = G. gramm = Pg. It. gramma, < F. gramme, a unit of mass (see def.), < LL. gramma, < LGr. γράμμα, a small weight (the weight of two oboli), a particular use of Gr. γράμμα, that which is drawn or written, a line, letter, writing, etc., < γράφειν, write: see graphic, grave[1].] In the metric system, a unit of mass. It is defined as the thousandth part of the mass of a certain piece of platinum preserved at Paris and called the Kilogramme des Archives. The intention was that the mass of a cubic centimeter of water at its maximum density should be one gram, and this is very nearly true. A gram is equal to 15.432+ troy grains. Abbreviation (by an international convention) gr.

gram[3] (gram), n. [Anglo-Ind., prob. < Pg. grão = Sp. grano, < L. granum, a grain, seed: see grain[1]. The Hind. name for chick-pea is chanā.] In the East Indies, the chick-pea, Cicer arietinum, there used extensively as fodder for horses and cattle, and also in cakes, curries, etc.

It. -gramma, < L. -gramma, < Gr. -γραμμα, γράμμα, what is written, a writing: see gram[2].] A terminal element in nouns of Greek origin, denoting 'that which is written or marked,' as in diagram, epigram, program, monogram, telegram, etc. Formerly and in programme still often written -gramme, after the French form. In the metric terms decagram, hectogram, etc., it is merely the word gram[2] in composition.

grama-grass (grä′mạ-grȧs), n. [Sp. grama, creeping cynodon (Cynodon [Capriola] Dactylon), also creeping wheat-grass (Triticum [Agropyron] repens).] A common name for several low grasses which are frequent upon the plains east of the Rocky Mountains and from western Texas to Arizona. The most abundant species is Bouteloua oligostachya, also called mesquite-grass and buffalo-grass. The name is also given to species of Muhlenbergia, common in the same region.

gramary (gram′ạ-ri), n. [Also, more archaically, gramarye; < ME. gramary, gramery, gramory, the same as gramere, gramer, grammar, often used as equiv. to 'learning, erudition,' and hence 'magic, enchantment,' as in OF. gramare, grimaire, F. grimoire, a book of conjuring or magic, hence jargon, gibberish, another form of gramaire, F. grammaire, grammar, and therefore identical with gramary. The word, in the spelling gramarye, was revived and used in the second sense by Sir Walter Scott, whence, like glamour, a word also revived by him, and ult. also identical with gramary and grammar, though not hitherto recognized as such, it has spread into some archaic literary use.] 1†. Grammar; hence, learning in general; erudition.

Cowthe ye by youre gramery reche us a drink, I should be more mery. Towneley Mysteries, p. 90.

2. Magic; enchantment. [Obsolete except as a literary archaism.]

Whate'er he did of gramarye
Was always done maliciously.
Scott, L. of L. M., iii. 11.

All white from head to foot, as if bleached by some strange gramarye. The Century, XXVII. 203.

All learning fell under suspicion, till at length the very grammar itself (the last volume in the world, one would say, to conjure with) gave to English the word gramary (enchantment), and in French became a book of magic, under the alias of grimoire.
Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 96.

gram-centimeter (gram′sen″ti-mē-tėr), n. A unit used in measuring mechanical work. It is equal to the work done against gravity in raising a mass of one gram through a vertical height of one centimeter, and is equivalent to g ergs (g being the acceleration of gravity)—that is, to about 980 ergs.

gram-degree (gram′dē-grē″), n. In physics, a calory. Also called gram-water-degree.

gramet†, n. and v. See gram[1].

gramercy (gra-mėr′si), interj. [< ME. gramercy, earlier grant mercy, graunt mercy, < OF. grammerci, grant merci, grand merci, lit. 'great thanks': see grand and mercy. Sometimes falsely explained as if grant were a verb in the imperative, grant mercy, have mercy!] Great thanks; many thanks: used interjectionally to express thankfulness, sometimes mingled with surprise. [Obsolete except as a literary archaism.]

He saith nought ones graunt mercy
To God, which alle grace sendeth.
Gower, Conf. Amant., I. 106.

Graunt mercy, quod the preest, and was ful glad.
Chaucer, Canon's Yeoman's Tale, l. 145.

For many of them they bring home sometimes paying very little for them, yea most commonly getting them for gramercy. Sir T. More, Utopia, ii. 8.

"Gramercy, Mammon" (said the gentle knight),
"For so great grace and offred high estate."
Spenser, F. Q., II. vii. 50.

There is many a fool can turn his nose up at good drink without ever having been out of the smoke of Old England; and so ever gramercy mine own fire-side.
Scott, Kenilworth, i.

Graminaceæ (gram-i-nā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Gramineæ.

graminaceous (gram-i-nā′shius), a. [< NL. graminaceus, < L. gramen (gramin-), grass. There is no proof of a connection with E. grass, q. v.] Same as gramineous.

Gramineæ (grạ-min′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., fem. pl. of L. gramineus, of or pertaining to grass: see gramineous.] In bot., the name given by Bernard Jussieu in his arrangement of the Garden of the Trianon, 1759, to the grass family, now called the Poaceæ (which see). The term is still in use. The family is the most important in the vegetable kingdom, including, as it does, the cereals. It contains about 342 genera and 3450 species. The stems are usually terete and hollow between the nodes, and the linear leaves are sheathing at the base and two-ranked. The flowers are glumaceous and for the most part bisexual, in spikelets which are variously arranged in spikes or panicles, each flower having a one-celled and one-ovuled ovary, which at maturity becomes the peculiar fruit known as a caryopsis. The species are generally herbaceous, some of the bamboos only becoming arborescent. Some species are fragrant and yield fragrant oils, and others furnish valuable material for paper.

gramineal (grạ-min′ē-ạl), a. [< gramine-ous + -al.] Same as gramineous.

gramineous (grạ-min′ē-us), a. [< L. gramineus, of or pertaining to grass, < gramen (gramin-), grass.] Grass-like; belonging or pertaining to the Gramineæ (Poaceæ). Also graminaceous, gramineal.

It flows through vast plains, slightly undulated and clothed with gramineous plants.
Elwes, tr. A. de S. Pinto's How I Crossed Afr., I. v. 101.

graminifolious (gram″i-ni-fō′li-us), a. [< L. gramen (gramin-), grass, + folium, a leaf.] In bot., having leaves resembling those of grass.

graminiform (grā-min'i-fôrm), a. [< L. gramen (gramin-), grass, + forma, shape.] Resembling grass.

graminite (gram'i-nīt), n. [< L. gramen (gramin-), grass, + -ite[2].] A grass-green mineral, a hydrated silicate of iron, allied to chloropal.

graminivorous (gram-i-niv'ō-rus), a. [< L. gramen (gramin-), grass, + vorare, eat, devour.] Feeding or subsisting on grass: said of oxen, sheep, horses, etc.

A willow-pattern sort o' man, voluble but harmless, a pure herbivorous, nay, mere graminivorous creature.
Carlyle, quoted in New Princeton Rev., II. 5.

graminology (gram-i-nol'ō-ji), n. [< L. gramen (gramin-), grass, + Gr. -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] A treatise on the grasses; the botanical science of grasses.

grammalogue (gram'a-log), n. [Irreg. < Gr. γράμμα, a letter, + λόγος, a word.] In phonog., a word represented by a single sign (a logogram), usually the principal consonant: as, it, represented by | (that is, t). I. Pitman.

grammar (gram'ăr), n. [Early mod. E. also grammer; < ME. grammere, usually with one m, gramer, gramere, gramour, sometimes gramary, gramery, gramory, < OF. gramaire, later and mod. F. grammaire, f., grammar (cf. gramaire, m., a grammarian), = Pr. gramaira, gramairia, a popular form based on a ML. type grammaria*, f., not found, the proper L. and ML. form being grammatica, grammatice (> It. Pg. grammatica = Sp. gramática = OF. gramatique), < Gr. γραμματική (sc. τέχνη, art), grammar, learning, criticism, fem. of γραμματικός, pertaining to or versed in letters or learning, < γράμμα, that which is drawn or written, a letter, writing, pl. γράμματα, the letters, the alphabet, the rudiments, in writing, letters, learning, < γράφειν, draw, write: see gram[2], graphic, grave[1]. Under the term grammar were formerly included, more or less vaguely, almost all branches of learning, as based on the study of language; and from this sense of 'learning' it came to imply profound or occult learning, and hence 'magic, enchantment,' in which sense the word is found in the variant forms gramary, gramery, etc., and glamery, glamer, glamour, etc.: see gramary and glamour. See also glomery, another var., in the lit. sense.] 1. A systematic account of the usages of a language, as regards especially the parts of speech it distinguishes, the forms and uses of inflected words, and the combinations of words into sentences; hence, also, a similar account of a group of languages, or of all languages or language in general, so far as these admit a common treatment. The formerly current classification of the subjects of grammar as fivefold, namely, orthography, orthoëpy, etymology, syntax, and prosody, is heterogeneous and obsolescent. The first and last do not belong really to grammar, though often for convenience included in the text-books of grammar; orthoëpy is properly phonology or phonetics, an account of the system of sounds used by a language and of their combinations; and etymology is improperly used for an account of the parts of speech and their inflections. See these words. Abbreviated gram.

Gramer for gurles [young people] I gon furste to write,
And beot hem with a baleys but zif thei wolde lernen.
Piers Plowman (A), xi. 131.

I can no more expoune in this matere:
I lerne song, I can but smal grammere.
Chaucer, Prioress's Tale, l. 84.

Remember ye not how in our own time, of al that taught grammar in England, not one understode ye Latine tongue?
Sir T. More, Works, p. 723.

Concerning speech and words, the consideration of them hath produced the science of Grammar.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 235.

2. Grammatical statements viewed as the rules of a language to which speakers or writers must conform; propriety of linguistic usage; accepted or correct mode of speech or writing.

Grammar is the art of true and well speaking a language: the writing is but an accident.
B. Jonson, English Grammar, i.

"Varium et mutabile semper femina" is the sharpest satire that ever was made on woman; for the adjectives are neuter, and "animal" must be understood to make them grammar. Dryden.

3. A treatise on grammar. Hence—4. An account of the elements of any branch of knowledge, prepared for teaching or learning; an outline or sketch of the principles of a subject: as, a grammar of geography; a grammar of art.—5. The formal principles of any science; a system of rules to be observed in the putting together of any kind of elements.

The young poet may be said to have reached the platform of literary maturity while he was yet learning the grammar of painting. W. Sharp, D. G. Rossetti, p. 315.

Comparative grammar, grammatical treatment of a number of languages, comparing their phenomena in order to derive knowledge of their relations and history or to deduce general principles of language.

grammar† (gram'ăr), v. i. [= OF. gramairer, gramarer, teach grammar; from the noun.] To discourse according to the rules of grammar.

She is in her
Moods and her tenses: I will grammar with you,
And make a trial how I can decline you.
Beau. and Fl., Laws of Candy, ii. 1.

grammarian (gra-mā'ri-an), n. [< ME. gramaryone (Prompt. Parv.); < F. grammairien = Pr. gramayrian; as grammar + -ian.] 1. One versed in grammar or the structure of language; a philologist.

I do not demand a consummate grammarian; but he [the tutor] must be a thorough master of vernacular orthography, with an insight into the accentualities and punctualities of modern Saxon, or English.
Lamb, Elia, p. 346.

2. One who writes upon or teaches grammar.

grammarianism (gra-mā'ri-an-izm), n. [< grammarian + -ism.] The principles or use of grammar; specifically, a pedantic observance of the rules of grammar. [Rare.]

grammar-school (gram'ăr-sköl), n. [< ME. grammerschole, gramerscole; < grammar + school. Cf. glomery.] 1. A school for teaching grammar; originally, a school for teaching Latin, which was begun by committing the grammar to memory. Grammar-schools were the successors of the cathedral and cloister schools, and in early times were established by endowment in most of the principal towns of England. Latin and Greek were the chief subjects of instruction, and the schools became places of preparation for the universities.

At thys present tyme there be ij. prestes; where-of the one seruyng the cure, and the other teaching a grammer-schole. English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 260.

Thou hast most traitorously corrupted the youth of the realm, in erecting a grammar-school.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iv. 7.

All the grammar schools [in 1835] belonged to the Church of England; sons of Nonconformists were, therefore, excluded, and had to go to the private school.
W. Besant, Fifty Years Ago, p. 154.

Hence—2. In the system of graded common schools in the United States, the grade or department in which English grammar is one of the subjects taught. The more common practice recognizes primary, grammar, and high schools; sometimes the division is into primary, intermediate, grammar, and high schools.

After passing through the primary grade, . . . the pupil [in the United States] enters the grammar school. The time required to pass through these two grades averages about eight years. At this point the education of many pupils ceases, while others continue through the high schools. Amer. Cyc., VI. 424.

grammates†, n. pl. [< ML. grammata, < Gr. γράμματα, letters, the alphabet, pl. of γράμμα, a letter: see gram[2], grammar.] The alphabet; elements, first principles, or rudiments of a branch of learning.

The grand old ballad of Sir Patrick Spence.
Coleridge, Dejection, st. 1.

And thus he bore without abuse
The grand old name of gentleman,
Defamed by every charlatan,
And soil'd with all ignoble use.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, cxi.

Now thou 'rt thy plain, grand self again.
Lowell, Lamartine.

3. Principal; chief; most important: as, the grand master of an order; a grand jury; the grand concern of one's life.

Thy grand captain Antony Shall set thee on triumphant chariots, and Put garlands on thy head. Shak., A. and C., iii. 1.

'Tis true on our side the sins of our lives not seldom fought against us; but on their side, besides those, the grand sin of their Cause. Milton, Eikonoklastes, xix.

No grand inquisitor could worse invent Than he contrives to suffer, well content.
Cowper, Truth, l. 103.

4. Prime; primal; first; original.

What cause
Moved our grand Parents in that happy state, Favour'd of heaven so highly, to fall off
From their Creator? Milton, P. L., i. 29.

5. In geneal., as a prefix, one degree more remote in ascent or descent: as, in grandfather, grandson (father's father, son's son), grandaunt (which see), grandnephew, grandniece (son or daughter of nephew or niece), etc.—6. Complete; comprehensive; including all particulars: as, a grand total.

The mind, indeed, enlighten'd from above,
Views him in all; ascribes to the grand cause
The grand effect. Cowper, Task, iii. 227.

7. In music, applied to compositions which contain all the regular parts or movements in a complete form: as, a grand sonata (a sonata containing all the proper parts in their full extent).—Grand action, in pianoforte-making, an action of the kind used in grand pianos. See piano.—Grand almoner. See almoner[1].—Grand Army of the Republic. See republic.—Grand assize. See assize.—Grand barré, in guitar- and banjo-playing, an effect produced by laying the forefinger of the left hand across all the strings.—Grand climacteric, commander, compounder, cordon, cross. See the nouns.—Grand days. See day[1].—Grand discount, in billiards. See discount, 4.—Grand distress, in old Eng. law, a writ of distress issued in the real action of quare impedit, when no appearance had been entered after the attachment, and commanding the sheriff to distrain all the defendant's lands and chattels in the county, in order to compel appearance.—Grand duke. [F. grand duc = It. granduca; G. grossherzog.] (a) A title of sovereignty over a territory called a grand duchy, next below that of king, and giving its holder the appellative "royal highness." The title was first created by the Pope for the rulers of Florence (afterward of Tuscany), who reigned under it from 1569 to 1859. The first to hold the title in Germany was Murat, created Grand Duke of Berg by Napoleon in 1806; and the only existing grand duchies are those of Baden, Hesse, Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Mecklenburg-Strelitz, Saxe-Weimar, and Oldenburg, belonging to the German empire, and Luxemburg, attached to the royal house of the Netherlands. The King of Prussia is titular Grand Duke of the Lower Rhine and Posen, and the Emperor of Austria of Tuscany (by inheritance) and Cracow. (b) A title used for the rulers of several of the principalities of Russia in the middle ages (more properly, great princes), and since for the sons of the czars of Russia, descended from the grand dukes (great princes) of Moscow.—Grand hauberk, juror, jury, etc. See the nouns.—Grand piano, quarter, seignior, sergeanty, stand, tour, etc. See the nouns.—The grand chop. See chop[4].—To get the grand bounce. See bounce.—Syn. Grand, Magnificent, Superb, Splendid; eminent, majestic, dignified, stately, august, pompous, elevated, exalted, lordly, princely, glorious. The first four words, so far as they are kindred in meaning, appeal primarily and strikingly to the eye, but also have figurative senses. In original sense, the grand is great or vast; the magnificent makes great or magnifies; the superb is lofty so as to overtop surrounding things; the splendid is radiant, dazzling. The grand suggests most of awe; the magnificent, most of pomp and ostentation, or largeness and amplitude of effect upon the mind: as, a magnificent banquet; a magnificent oration; superb, most of superiority in some way; splendid, most of successful challenge to admiration. All of these words are often used colloquially in weak hyperbole. See sublime.

To conquer Sin and Death, the two grand foes.
Milton, P. R., i. 159.

Far distant he descries, Ascending by degrees magnificent
Up to the wall of heaven, a structure high.
Milton, P. L., iii. 502.

On whose breast's superb abundance
A man might base his head.

B. Jonson, Speech according to Horace.

grandly (grand′li), adv. In a grand or lofty manner; greatly; splendidly; sublimely.

grandma (grand′mä), n. A colloquial abbreviation of grandmamma.

grandmamma (grand′ma-mä″), n. A familiar term for grandmother.

Your prudent grand-mammas, ye modern belles, . . .
When health requir'd it would consent to roam,
Else more attached to pleasures found at home.
Cowper, Retirement, l. 515.

grand-mercy†, interj. An earlier form of gramercy. Chaucer.

grandmother (grand′muŦH″ėr), n. [< late ME. graundmother; < grand + mother. Cf. F. grand'mère.] 1. The mother of one's father or mother: correlative to grandson, granddaughter, and grandchild.

The unfeigned faith that is in thee, which dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois, and thy mother Eunice.
2 Tim. i. 5.

2. By extension, any more remote lineal female ancestor.

A child of our grandmother Eve; . . . or, for thy more sweet understanding, a woman. Shak., L. L. L., i. 1.

grandmotherly (grand′muŦH″ėr-li), a. [< grandmother + *-ly*1.] Pertaining to, resembling, or characteristic of a grandmother.

A gentle, pensive, grandmotherly sort of way.
Mrs. Oliphant, Ladies Lindores, p. 28.

A grandmotherly being who thinks a student can do no wrong. Andover Rev., March, 1885.

grandnephew (grand′nev″ū), n. A son of one's nephew or niece: correlative to granduncle and grandaunt.

grandness (grand′nes), n. The quality of being grand; greatness; grandeur; magnificence.

In order to prove to any one the grandness of this fabric of the world, one needs only bid him consider the sun with that insupportable glory and lustre that surrounds it.
W. Wollaston, Religion of Nature, v. 14.

grandniece (grand′nēs), n. A daughter of one's nephew or niece: correlative to granduncle and grandaunt.

grando1† (gran′dō), n. [L., hail.] The treadle of an egg. See extract under gallature.

grando2†, n. See grandee.

grandpa (grand′pä), n. A colloquial abbreviation of grandpapa.

grandpapa (grand′pa-pä″), n. A familiar term for grandfather.

grandparent (grand′pãr″ent), n. The parent of a parent: correlative to grandchild.

grandparentage (grand′pãr″en-tāj), n. [< grandparent + -age.] Grandparents collectively; also, the state of being a grandparent, or of having grandparents.

Certain properties of the law of frequency of error were also applied to family likeness in eye colour, with results that gave by calculation the total number of light-eyed children in families differently grouped according to their parentage and grandparentage. Nature, XXXIX. 299.

grand-paunch† (grand′pânch), n. A greedy fellow; a gormand.

Our grand-paunches and riotous persons have devised for themselves a delicate kind of meat out of corn and grain. Holland, tr. of Pliny, xix. 4.

grandpère (groṅ′pãr′), n. A variety of the cotillion formerly common.

grand-piece (grand′pēs), n. [F. grande-pièce.] A name of certain pieces of armor of the sixteenth century. The grand-pieces often mentioned were probably the genouillières, cubitières, and pauldrons — that is, the pieces added after the coverings of the limbs and body were put in place.

grand-relief (grand′rē-lēf″), n. In sculp., alto-rilievo.

Grandry corpuscle. See corpuscle.

grandsire (grand′sīr), n. [< ME. grantsyre, grauntsire, gransyre, graunser, < OF. grantsire, < grant, grand, great, old, + sire, sire.] 1. A grandfather: used for both men and animals, and now especially in the pedigrees of horses.

His graunt-sire, the kynge Adrian, that tho was livynge, counseiled hym to take the ordere of knyghthode.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 186.

2. By extension, any lineal male ancestor preceding a father.

Some sorcerer, whom a far-off grandsire burnt Because he cast no shadow. Tennyson, Princess, i.

3. In change-ringing: (a) One of the methods of ringing the changes on a peal of bells: supposed to be of very early origin. (b) See double, n., 9 (f).

grandson (grand′sun), n. [< grand + son.] The son or male offspring of a son or daughter: correlative to grandfather and grandmother.

He . . . left his coal all turn'd into gold
To a grandson, first of his noble line.
Tennyson, Maud, x.

granduncle (grand′ung″kl), n. [After F. grand-oncle.] The brother of a grandfather or grandmother: in the United States generally called great-uncle: correlative to grandnephew and grandniece.

grane1 (grān), v. and n. A Scotch form of groan.

They've nae sair wark to craze their banes,
An' fill auld age wi' grips and granes.
Burns, The Twa Dogs.

grane2† (grān), v. t. [Origin obscure.] To strangle.

One executioner on one side, and another on the other, graned him with a linnen cloth about his neck, pulling the same untill they forced him to gape.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 112.

granert, n. [Also granier, var. grainer, grainery, granary, garner: see these forms.] A granary; a garner.

There banquet-houses, walks for pleasure; here again
Cribs, graners, stables, barns.
Drayton, Polyolbion, iii. 258.

That other, if he in his Granier stores
What ever hath beene swept from Lybian flores.
Heath, tr. of Horace's Odes, i.

grange (grānj), n. [< ME. grange, graunge, gronge, < OF. grange, granche, graunge, F. grange = Pr. granja, granga = Sp. Pg. granja, < ML. granea, a barn, grange, < L. granum, grain, corn: see *grain*1, granary, garner.] 1†. A granary.

For their teeming flocks and granges full,
In wanton dance they praise the bounteous Pan.
Milton, Comus, l. 175.

2†. A farming establishment, including the farm-buildings and granary, attached to a feudal manor or to a religious house, where, in addition to its own crops, the grain paid as rent and tithes was stored.

At the moated grange resides this dejected Mariana.
Shak., M. for M., iii. 1.

A grange, in its original signification, meant a farmhouse of a monastery, . . . from which it was always at some little distance. One of the monks was usually appointed to inspect the accounts of the farm. He was called the prior of the grange. Malone.

3. A farm, with its dwelling-house, stables, byres, barns, etc.; particularly, a house or farm at a distance from other houses or villages; the dwelling of a yeoman or gentleman farmer.

He . . . ledde hym forth to lauacrum lex-dei, a graunge,
Is sixe myle other seuene by-syde the newe markett.
Piers Plowman (C), xx. 71.

What tell'st thou me of robbing? this is Venice;
My house is not a grange. Shak., Othello, i. 1.

Fill him with joy, and win him a friend to ye,
And make this little grange seem a large empire
Let out with home contents.
Fletcher (and another?), Prophetess, v.

And from the distant grange there comes
The clatter of the thresher's flail.
Bryant, Song of the Sower.

4. In the United States, a lodge of the order of "Patrons of Husbandry," a secret association for the promotion of the interests of agriculture. The special objects of the order are the removal of the restraints and burdens imposed on agriculture by the commercial classes, the railroad and canal companies, etc., and the avoidance of the expense caused by the middlemen or agents who intervene between the producer and the consumer. The association originated at Washington in 1867, and has spread over the whole country, but is most numerous in the northwestern States. There are local and State granges and a national grange. Women are admitted to membership.

We quite admit, in view of the farmers' granges in Illinois and Wisconsin, . . . that the design to fix the price at which one's own labor shall be sold is just as common in the Great West as in Europe.
T. Hughes, quoted in Hinton's Eng. Radical Leaders, p. 119.

The organization therefore is maintained for social and economic purposes, and no grange can assume any political or sectarian functions. Amer. Cyc., IX. 89.

grange† (grānj), v. t. [< grange, n.] To farm, as revenue or taxes.

This ruffianry of causes I am daily more and more acquainted with, and see the manner of dealing, which cometh of the Queen's straitness to give these women, whereby they presume thus to grange and truck causes.
Birch, Queen Elizabeth, I. 354.

granger (grān'jėr), n. and a. [Formerly also graunger; < OF. grangier, granger, a farmer, bailiff, < grange, a grange: see grange.] I. n. 1†. A farm-steward or -bailiff.

Unlesse this proportion and quantitie of mucke be gathered, plaine it is, that the graunger or maister of husbandrie hath not done his part, but failed in littering of his cattell. Holland, tr. of Pliny, xviii. 23.

2. A member of a farmers' grange for the advancement of the interests of agriculture. See grange, n., 4.

The time has now come when the Granger can be looked upon as a phenomenon of the past, and treated in a spirit of critical justice.
C. F. Adams, Jr., N. A. Rev., CXX. 395.

3. A farmer; a countryman. [Humorous, U. S.]

II. a. Of or pertaining to a grange or to grangers; caused or promoted by grangers: as, the granger movement.

The rash granger laws of more than a decade ago firmly established the principle and the right of extreme State supervision. Contemporary Rev., LI. 700.

The Granger cases, six cases decided by the United States Supreme Court in 1876 (94 U. S., 113, 155, 165, 179, 180, 181), the principal ones being Munn vs. Illinois, and Chicago, Burlington, and Quincy Railroad Co. vs. Iowa: so called because they grew out of certain State statutes passed in the interest of the grangers, regulating grain-elevator tolls and the charges of warehousemen and common carriers. The court sustained the constitutionality of these statutes, affirming the common-law doctrine that when private property is devoted to a public use it is subject to public regulation, and holding that this right is not affected by the fourteenth amendment to the United States Constitution, which ordains that no State shall "deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law."

grangerism[1] (grān'jėr-izm), n. [< granger, I., 2, + -ism.] The principles and methods of the grangers of the United States.

grangerism[2] (grān'jėr-izm), n. [< Granger (see def.) + -ism.] The practice of illustrating a book by binding up in it engravings taken from other books, or with independent prints, water-colors, etc.; also, the resulting mutilation of books. The practice became popular when James Granger published, in 1769, his "Biographical History of England," which incited persons to mutilate other books to illustrate it.

Grangerism, as the innocent may need to be told, is the pernicious vice of cutting plates and title-pages out of many books to illustrate one book.
Saturday Review, Jan. 29, 1883, p. 123.

grangerite (grān'jėr-īt), n. [< Granger (see grangerism[2]) + -ite[2].] One who illustrates a book with engravings from other books, or with independent prints, water-colors, etc. See grangerism[2].

"He was not," says Mr. Hill Burton, speaking of the Kirkpatrick Sharpe, "he was not a black-letter man, or a tall-copyist, or an uncut man, or a rough-edge man, or an early-English dramatist, or an Elzeviran, or a broadsider, or a pasquinader, or an old-brown-calf man, or a Grangerite, or a tawny-moroccoite, or a gilt-topper, or a marbled-insider, or an editio princeps man." These nicknames briefly dispose into categories a good many species of collectors. The Bookmart, July, 1883.

grangerize (grān'jėr-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. grangerized, ppr. grangerizing. [< Granger (see grangerism[2]) + -ize.] To illustrate in the method called grangerism.

The boo'k [Works of Victor Hugo] was grangerized by the author himself as a gift to his goddaughter.
New York Evening Post, Dec. 18, 1885.

It proves to be a very handsome grangerized copy of Byron's "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers," the pages mounted on large paper, and profusely interspersed with water-colour drawings or engraved portraits of the poets and others mentioned by Byron in the famous satire.
Athenæum, Oct. 9, 1886, p. 468.

grangerizer (grān'jėr-ī-zėr), n. Same as grangerite.

Each of the 500 copies will be printed direct from the type; and the portraits of actors will be paged separately, with blank backs, for the benefit of Grangerizers.
New York Tribune, Jan. 13, 1889.

gran gusto (grän gös'tō). [It., lit. 'great relish': see grand and gusto.] 1. In painting, something in a picture very extraordinary and calculated to excite surprise.—2. In music, any high-wrought composition.

grani, n. Plural of grano.

granier†, n. See graner.

graniferous (grā-nif'ē-rus), a. [< L. granifer, grain-bearing (only as applied poet. to ants), < granum, grain (see grain[1]), + ferre = E. bear[1].] Bearing grain, or seeds like grain: as, graniferous pods.

graniform (gran'i-fôrm), a. [< L. granum, grain, + forma, shape.] Having the form of a grain or seed.

granilla (grā-nil'ä; Sp. pron. grä-nē'lyä), n. [Sp., dim. of grana, cochineal, grain: see grain[1].] Small or half-grown cochineal-insects. See grain[1], 11.

There is often a second production of cochineal before the wet season sets in; if so, it is scraped off with a knife and dried, but it is of inferior quality, and is sold under the name of granilla.
Calvert, Dyeing and Calico-printing, p. 208.

granillo (grā-nil'ō), n. Same as granilla.

granite (gran'it), n. [= D. graniet = G. Dan. ★Sw. granit = F. granit = Sp. Pg. granito, < It. granito, granite, lit. grained, < granito, pp. of granire, reduce to grains, seed, run to seed, < grano, grain, seed: see grain[1]. Cf. granate, garnet[1], and pomegranate.] 1. In petrog., a granular igneous rock composed chiefly of alkali feldspar and quartz, usually with one or more of the subordinate minerals muscovite, biotite, hornblende, or augite. Granite commonly contains some soda-lime feldspar (plagioclase), which is not essential under the modern definition. The name is said to have been first used by Cæsalpinus in 1596, but was probably applied by him to any coarsely granular rock. Precision was given to the term by Werner (1785), who restricted its use to crystalline granular rocks composed of feldspar, quartz, and mica, making, however, no distinction between alkali and soda-lime feldspars, or between the micas muscovite and biotite. Gradually it became known that the feldspar group included several kinds each of potash and soda feldspars and the large series of soda-lime feldspar or plagioclase. It thus became desirable to further restrict the term granite to the rocks with dominant alkali feldspar, the most common being the potash-bearing varieties, orthoclase or microcline. It was further found that the micas might be absent and in their stead might appear hornblende, augite, diallage, or other dark silicates. This range in the mineral components of granite has given rise to many varietal names, the most important being the following: aplite (haplite), consisting of alkali feldspar and quartz; muscovite-granite; biotite-granite or granitite; granite proper, containing both micas; hornblende-granite; augite-granite; etc. Pegmatite is a very coarse-grained granite. Graphic granite is the name applied to a regular intergrowth of quartz and orthoclase in which the quartz, as seen in certain sections, exhibits forms resembling Hebrew characters. Such intergrowths are common in pegmatite masses. 'Granite' is used by quarrymen and builders for almost any granular rock of light color, and even dark rocks are sometimes referred to as 'black granite.' The color of granite is somewhat varied, although in much the larger number of cases the predominating tint is a light gray; some varieties, however, are almost as white as white marble; others are of a light-red or a pink color, which tint is due to the predominance of a rose-colored feldspar. Some varieties of granite are very massive and homogeneous in texture; hence this rock can often be quarried in blocks of large size. Granite is much used for building purposes where massiveness and durability are the chief requisites. It resists very poorly, however, the action of fire, flaking off and crumbling under the influence of heat. Many varieties take a fine polish, and are used for interior decoration and for monumental work. Its hardness and coarseness of texture make it unfit for statuary.

These [rocks] are not made up of fragments derived from previously-formed rocks, but, for the most part, are crystalline, that is, are made up of crystals, either felted together or imbedded in a glass or base. Granite, porphyry, and basalt are examples of such crystalline rocks.
A. Geikie, Phys. Geog., p. 202.

2. A kind of rough-grained water-ice or sherbet. Also called rock-punch and rock ice-cream. See the extract.

Granites . . . must be frozen without beating, or even much stirring, as the design is to have a rough, icy substance. New York Tribune, April 7, 1887.

3. Same as granite-ware.—Granite City, Aberdeen in Scotland: so called because most of the buildings are of granite, which is worked extensively in the neighborhood. —Granite State, New Hampshire, U. S.: so called from the prevalence of granite in it.

granitel, granitelle (gran'i-tel), n. [Dim. of granite.] A granite poor in mica.

granite-porphyry (gran'it-pôr"fi-ri), n. In petrog., an igneous rock of porphyritic texture having the composition of granite. The name is usually applied to rocks of rather coarse-grained groundmass, those of finer grain being called felsite- or quartz-porphyry, and those of coarser ground-mass porphyritic granite.

granite-ware (gran'it-wār), n. 1. Any fine pottery decorated by a more or less exact imitation of the speckled surface of granite; specifically, one of Josiah Wedgwood's pebble-wares, described by him in 1770 as "barely sprinkled with blue and ornaments gilt." See pebble-ware.—2. A fine pottery similar to iron-stone china, referring to its supposed hardness. [Trade-name.]—3. A variety of enameled iron-ware much used for utensils of cookery, in which the enamel is gray and stone-like, and very durable.

granitic (grā-nit'ik), a. [< granite + -ic.] 1. Made or formed of granite; having the texture or composition of granite. See granite, 1, and granitoid.

In the iron age we find granitic hills shaped or excavated into temples.
E. D. Cope, Origin of the Fittest, p. 152.

2. Resembling granite in some of its properties. [Rare.]

The granitic, patriarchal figure of Job, round which concentrates the interest of the play, is strikingly conceived.
Edinburgh Rev., CLXIII. 137.

granitical (grā-nit'i-kal), a. [< granitic + -al.] Same as granitic. [Rare.]

graniticoline (gran-i-tik'ō-lin), a. [< granite + L. colere, inhabit, + -ine[1].] In lichenology, growing upon or attached to granite.

granitification (grā-nit"i-fi-kā'shon), n. [< granitify: see -fication.] The act of forming into granite, or the state or process of being formed into granite.

granitiform (grā-nit'i-fôrm), a. Having the form of granite; resembling granite in structure or shape.

granitify (grā-nit'i-fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. granitified, ppr. granitifying. [< granite + -i-fy.] To form into granite.

granitite (gran'i-tīt), n. [< granite + -ite[2].] A name proposed by Rose (1857) for a variety of granite rich in oligoclase and red orthoclase, with quartz and a little dark green magnesian mica (biotite), but free from muscovite. The term is now more generally applied to all granites characterized by biotite. Also biotite-granite.

granitoid (gran'i-toid), a. [< granite + -oid.] Like granite; holocrystalline; granular: applied to rocks resembling granite in texture, that is, composed of grains of approximately equal size. The term is usually applied to coarse-grained rocks of which the constituent particles are visible to the unaided eye. Also granular and granitic.

granitone (gran'i-tōn), n. [< granite + -one.] See gabbro.

Granivoræ† (grā-niv'ō-rē), n. pl. [NL., fem. pl. of granivorus: see granivorous.] A group of granivorous birds.

granivorous (grā-niv'ō-rus), a. [< NL. granivorus, < L. granum, grain, + vorare, eat, devour.] Eating grain; feeding or subsisting on seeds: as, granivorous birds.

grannam† (gran'am), n. [Corruption of grandam, q. v.] Same as grandam.

Old men i' the house, of fifty, call me grannam.
Beau. and Fl., Scornful Lady, iv. 1.

Ghosts never walk till after midnight, if I may believe my grannam.
Fletcher (and Massinger?), Lovers' Progress, iv. 2.

★granny (gran'i), n.; pl. grannies (-iz). [A childish abbr. of grannam, grandam, or grandmother.] 1. A grandmother; an old woman. [Colloq. and low.]

"Fairly good holy images thou hast here, granny; keep them in good order," said I to the old woman.
Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 376.

2. A duck, the south-southerly or old-wife. More fully, old granny. [New Jersey, U. S.]

granny's-knot, granny-knot (gran'iz-, gran'i-not), n. Naut., a knot differing from a reef or square knot in having the second part crossed the wrong way: derided by seamen because it is difficult to untie when jammed.

granonst, n. pl. [< OF. grenon, grenun, gregnon, grignon, guernon, gernon, gernun, mustache, whiskers.] The whiskers of a cat. Topsell, p. 104. (Halliwell.) granophyre (gran'ō-fīr), n. [< L. granum, grain (cf. granite), + (por)phyr(ites), porphyry.] In petrog., a name proposed by Vogelsang (1875) for a porphyritic igneous rock with a crystalline granular ground-mass, in distinction from felsophyre and vitrophyre, in which the ground-mass is felsitic or vitreous. Also applied to porphyries characterized by the 'granophyric' texture of Rosenbusch, in which quartz and orthoclase are intergrown in the manner called 'graphic.'

granophyric (gran-ō-fir'ik), a. [< granophyre + -ic.] Related or belonging to the texture characterizing the rock called granophyre.

granose (grā'nōs), a. [< L. granosus, full of grain, < granum, grain: see grain[1].] In entom., having the form of a string of grains or beads; moniliform, as the antennæ of many insects.

grant[1] (grânt), v. [Early mod. E. also graunt; < ME. granten, graunten, grantien, grauntien, < OF. granter, graanter, graaunter, graunter, grantier (AF. granter, graunter), greanter, the same (with irreg. change of c to g, perhaps due to association with OF. garantir, guarantee) as OF. craanter, creanter, cranter, promise, assure, guarantee, confirm, ratify, < ML. as if credentare* (found only in the form creantare, a reflex of the OF.), < L. creden(t-)s (> OF. creant), ppr. of credere, believe, trust: see credent, credit, creant[1], creance.] I. trans. 1. To transfer the title or possession of in any formal way, specifically for a sufficient or valuable consideration; give or make over; especially, to convey by deed or writing.

Grant me the place of this threshing-floor.
1 Chron. xxi. 22.

The commons . . . granted a tenth of the revenue and income not belonging to the lords of parliament; and the lords . . . followed it up with a similar grant from their own property. Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 370.

2. To bestow or confer, particularly in answer to prayer or request.

Now God, that all thynge giveth, graunte hus soule reste.
Piers Plowman.

Thou hast granted me life and favour. Job x. 12.

3†. To allow; permit.

Though attempered wepyng be graunted, outrageous wepyng certes is defended. Chaucer, Tale of Melibeus.

4†. To assent to; answer in the affirmative.

She graunted him; ther was noon other grace.
Chaucer, Good Women, l. 2666.

5. To admit to be true; concede, as something obvious or not required to be proved; accept or concede without proof.

Tis a rule that holds forever true,
Grant me discernment, and I grant it you.
Cowper, Progress of Error, l. 535.

I grant him brave,
But wild as Bracklinn's thundering wave.
Scott, L. of the L., ii. 14.

To grant an annuity See annuity.—To take for granted, to assume the existence or truth of; believe or credit without confirmative evidence or positive knowledge: as, I took his qualifications for granted.

She took it for granted that her companion was familiar with every slope and corrie of these Lochaber hills.
W. Black, In Far Lochaber, iii.

=Syn. 1 and 2. Confer, Bestow, etc. See give[1].

II.† intrans. To consent; assent; give permission or countenance.

The barons yaf hym counseile firste to assaile the Duke, and therto the kynge graunted.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), i. 70.

The soldiers should have toss'd me on their pikes
Before I would have granted to that act.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., i. 1.

grant[1] (grânt), n. [< ME. grant, graunt, < OF. grant, graant, graunt, greant, creant, crant, m. (also graante, creante, crante, f.) (ML. grantum), a promise, assurance, engagement; from the verb.] 1†. A promise; a thing promised.

I sholde han also blame of every wyght,
My fadres graunte if that I so withstode,
Syn she is chaunged for the tounes goode.
Chaucer, Troilus, iv. 552.

When Achilles this chaunse choisely hade herd,
He was glad of the graunt, and the god answared.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 4488.

2. The act of granting; a conferring or conceding.

The body of the people . . . elects the . . . chief executive magistrate but twice in five years. Here is a clear grant of power for a long term.
J. Adams, Works, IV. 326.

3. A thing granted or conferred; a boon; especially, something conveyed by deed or patent: often used of tracts of land granted to colonists, railroad companies, etc.

Queen Elizabeth, at the request of William Harbourn, an English-man, procur'd a Grant from the Turkish Emperor for the English Merchants to exercise free Traffick in all places of his Dominions. Baker, Chronicles, p. 355.

I humbly kiss your ladyship's fair learned hands, and wish you good wishes and speedy grants.
Donne, Letters, v.

The country west of the Connecticut was only known at that time [1760] by the name of "New Hampshire grants." Amer. Cyc., XVI. 318.

4. In law: (a) Originally, a creating or transferring by deed: used in reference to mere rights, estates in expectancy, and incorporeal property, which could not be delivered. Thus, easements, franchises, etc., were said to lie in grant, because they could not be created or transferred by livery or seizin. (b) In modern use, a conveyance in writing of such things as cannot pass or be transferred by word only, as land, rents, reversions, tithes, etc.

Onias, having got a grant of the place, . . . erected a temple there, neither so big nor so costly as that at Jerusalem. Abp. Ussher, Annals.

5. An admission of something as true.

This grant destroys all you have urg'd before. Dryden.

6. In brewing, a copper or iron vessel into which the wort flows from the clarifying battery, and from which it is lifted into the wort-pan.—Capitation grant. See capitation.=Syn. 3. Largess, Donation, etc. (see present, n.); allowance, stipend, bounty.

grant[2]†, a. A Middle English form of grand.

grantable (grân'tạ-bl), a. [< AF. grauntable, creantable, < granter, etc., grant: see grant[1], v., and -able.] Capable of being granted or conveyed.

I will inquire, therefore, in what cases dispensations are grantable, and by whom.
Bp. Sherlock, Charge (1769), p. 6.

By coming to the Crown they became grantable in that way to the subject, and a great part of the church lands passed through the Crown to the people.
Burke, Dormant Claims of the Church.

grantee (grân-tē'), n. [< AF. granté, < granter, grant: see grant[1] and -ee[1].] In law, the person to whom anything is granted, or to whom a grant or conveyance is made.

Was Shakspeare an Esquire?—He was the eldest son of a grantee of arms. Now, a grantee of arms is an esquire by letters patent. N. and Q., 7th ser., V. 369.

granter (grân'tèr), n. [Early mod. E. also graunter; < grant[1] + -er[1]. Cf. grantor.] One who grants. Compare grantor.

For I myself am that bread, the graunter of immortall lyfe, and alone came downe from heauen.
J. Udall, On John vi.

gran'ther (gran'thèr), n. A dialectal contraction of grandfather.

The ole queen's arm thet Gran'ther Young Fetched back from Concord busted.
Lowell, The Courtin'.

Grantia (gran'ti-ạ), n. [NL., < Grant, a proper name.] A genus of chalk-sponges, giving name to a family Grantiidæ.

Norman observes that our common Grantia compressa, with its varieties and "possible modifications," has 28 generic, subgeneric, and subspecific names, which might be further extended to 54. Pascoe, Zoöl. Class., p. 18.

Grantiidæ (gran-tī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Grantia + -idæ.] A family of chalk-sponges, typified by the genus Grantia.

Grantiinæ (gran-ti-ī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Grantia + -inæ.] A subfamily of Syconidæ with branched ciliated chambers, typified by the genus Grantia. Also Grantina, Grantinæ. R. von Lendenfeld.

grantise†, n. [ME., < grant[1], v.] A grant; a concession.

grantor (grân'tọr), n. [< AF. grantor, OF. creanteor, < granter, creanter, etc., grant: see grant[1] and -or.] In law, the person who makes a grant or conveyance: correlative to grantee.

Many links in the feudal chain might intervene between the original grantor, or Lord Paramount, and the actual occupant of the soil.
Sir E. Creasy, Eng. Const., p. 72.

In England, if the grantor cannot sign, he may make his mark. The American, VI. 270.

granula (gran'ū-lạ), n.; pl. granulæ (-lē). [NL., fem. (cf. LL. granulum, neut.), a little grain: see granule.] 1. In bot., a little grain: applied to the large sporule contained in the center of many algæ, as Gloionema.—2. In zoöl.: (a) [cap.] A genus of mollusks. (b) A small rounded elevation; one of the elevations of a granulated surface. Also granule.—3. In anat., a granule.

★granular (gran'ū-lạr), a. [< granule + -ar[2].] Composed of, containing, or bearing grains or granules; resembling grains or granules. Also granulose, granulous.—Compound granular corpuscles. Same as granule-cells.—Granular degeneration. Same as cloudy swelling (which see, under cloudy).—Granular eyes, eyes composed of many minute, distinct lenses or facets, as the compound eyes or ocelli of insects.—Granular kidney, a kidney with chronic diffuse or interstitial nephritis, which presents a granular or nodular surface on the removal of the capsule.—Granular layer of dentine, a layer often found toward the outer portion of the dentine, marked by very fine nodules or globules of dentine and interglobular spaces.—Granular layer of the epidermis, the layer of granular cells (stratum granulosum) lying below the stratum lucidum and above the stratum spinosum.—Granular lids, eyelids affected by inflammation of the conjunctival surface with minute outgrowths of lymphoid tissue forming so-called granulations.—Granular limestone, a limestone having a crystalline-granular character.—Granular liver, a liver with chronic interstitial hepatitis (cirrhosis), which presents a granular or nodular surface.—Granular pharyngitis, chronic inflammation of the follicles of the pharynx. Also called follicular pharyngitis, chronic pharyngitis, and clergyman's sore throat.

The emulsion should be of a good orange-ruby color when a drop is examined by transmitted light, and should show no granularity with a magnifier.
Sci. Amer. Supp., p. 9133.

granularly (gran'ū-lạr-li), adv. In a granular form; in granules.

granulary† (gran'ū-lạ-ri), a. [< granule + -ary.] Granular.

Smallcoal is known unto all, and for this use is made of sallow, willow, halder, hasell, and the like; which three, proportionably mixed, tempered, and formed into granulary bodies, do make up that powder which is in use for guns. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 5.

granulate (gran'ū-lāt), v.; pret. and pp. granulated, ppr. granulating. [< NL. as if granulatus*, pp. of granulare* (> It. granulare = Sp. Pg. granular = F. granuler), < L. granum, a grain: see grain[1].] I. trans. 1. To form into grains: as, to granulate powder or sugar.—2. To raise in granules; make rough on the surface.

I have observed in many birds the gullet, before its entrance into the gizzard, to be much dilated, and thick-set, or as it were granulated with a multitude of glandules.
Ray.

II. intrans. To become formed into grains; become granular.

granulate (gran'ū-lāt), a. [< NL. granulatus, pp.: see the verb.] Same as granulated or granular.

granulated (gran'ū-lā-ted), p. a. 1. Consisting of or resembling grains.—2. Having small and even elevations resembling grains: as, granulated leather; the granulated root of a plant, as Saxifraga granulata.

It would be too much to assert that the skin of the dog-fish was made rough and granulated on purpose for the polishing of wood. Paley, Nat. Theol., v.

3. In ceram., decorated with color in spots, or mottled. See soufflé.—4. In pathol.: (a) Having little grain-like fleshy bodies filling up the cavities, as ulcers and suppurating wounds. (b) Characterized by the presence of small grain-like bodies: as, a granulated liver.—Granulated glass. See glass.—Granulated work, in jewelry, decoration by means of minute grains applied to the surface, especially in goldsmiths' work.

Repoussé figures alternate with strings of the finest granulated work, and the exquisite devices testify to the use by the Etruscans of agencies unknown to us.
Wheatley and Delamotte, Art Work in Gold and Silver, [p. 15.

granulating-machine (gran'ū-lā-ting-mạ-shēn″), n. A machine used to reduce some substance to the form of grains. Specifically—(a) In powder-making, an apparatus for breaking up the powder-cake into grains of various sizes. (b) An apparatus for reducing liquid metals to fine grains. It consists of a horizontal disk of terra-cotta made to revolve rapidly, upon which the liquid metal falls and is then scattered in every direction, centrifugally, into the air or into water, in a finely granulated condition.

★granulation (gran-ū-lā'shọn), n. [= F. granulation = Sp. granulación = Pg. granulação = It. granulazione; as granulate + -ion.] 1. The act of forming into grains; the state or process of being formed into grains: as, the granulation of gunpowder or sugar.

Granulation is the process by which metals are reduced to minute grains. It is effected by pouring them, in a melted state, through an iron cullender pierced with small holes into a body of water, or directly upon a bundle of twigs immersed in water. In this way copper is granulated into bean-shot, and silver alloys are granulated preparatory to refining. Ure, Dict., II. 734.

2. In surg. pathol.: (a) The formation of new tissue, as in the repair of wounds, the free surface of which presents a granulated appearance. This tissue is called granulation tissue. (b) Any one of the small granular elevations on the free surface of granulation tissue.

Tents in wounds, by resisting the growth of the little granulations of the flesh, in process of time harden them, and in that manner produce a fistula. Sharpe, Surgery.

3. In med. pathol., the formation of small grain-like bodies or tubercles in the substance of an organ, as in tubercular phthisis.—4. In zoöl. and bot.: (a) A roughening of a surface with little tubercles like grains, or a surface so studded. (b) One of the little elevations in a granulated surface.—Granulation corpuscles. Same as granule-cells.—Granulations of the eyelids, minute outgrowths of lymphoid tissue on the inner surface of the eyelids.—Granulation tissue, such tissue as grows in wounds, repairing the loss of substance, and formed from connective tissue or emigrated white blood-corpuscles. It consists of numerous cells, with more or less intercellular substance permeated by numerous thin-walled blood-vessels.

granulative (gran′ū-lā-tiv), a. [< granulate + -ive.] Granulated or granulating: as, granulative growths.

granulator (gran′ū-lā-tor), n. One who or that which granulates; specifically, a granulating-machine.

A small stream of water enters the granulator; the movement of the machine rolling the damp grains constantly among the dry meal powder.
Workshop Receipts, 1st ser., p. 145.

This gentleman saw white sugar come out of spouts, and heard a granulator revolving at the rate of 300 rotations per minute. The Engineer, LXVI. 273.

★granule (gran′ūl), n. [= F. granule, < LL. granulum, NL. also granula, dim. of L. granum, grain: see grain[1].] A little grain; a fine particle. Specifically—(a) In cryptogamic bot., a term formerly applied to the spores of cryptogamic plants. (b) In anat., a corpuscle or particle: a term applied to little bodies in the blood, in fat, in protoplasm, etc., but not specific in any sense. (c) In entom., specifically, a very minute elevation: said of the sculpture of insects. (d) In zoöl., same as granula, 2 (b).—Episternal granules. See episternal.

granule-cells (gran′ūl-selz), n. pl. Round cells densely crowded with fat-globules, found in areas of softening in the brain. Also called granule-corpuscles, Gluge's corpuscles, compound granular corpuscles, and granulation corpuscles.

granuliferous (gran-ū-lif′e-rus), a. [< LL. granulum, a little grain, + L. ferre = E. bear[1].] Bearing or producing granules or granulations.

granuliform (gran′ū-li-fôrm), a. [< LL. granulum, a little grain, + L. forma, shape.] 1. In mineral., having a granular structure.—2. In bot., granular.

granulite (gran′ū-līt), n. [< granule + -ite[2].] In petrog., a term proposed by Weiss for certain fine and even-grained gneisses of the Erzgebirge in Saxony, consisting of orthoclase, quartz, garnet with some biotite, hornblende or augite. It is used in France for a muscovite-granite with automorphic quartz grains. In England it is applied to fine-grained granites containing orthoclase, quartz, muscovite, and garnet. Little used in America. Synonyms are leptynite (French), weisstein (German).

granulitic (gran-ū-lit′ik), a. [< granulite + -ic.] Pertaining to granulite; of the nature of granulite: as, granulitic rock.

The rocks may be classed under three heads:—(1) . . . (2) the light-banded granulitic gneisses or Wiltshire type. The Engineer, LXV. 379.

granulomatous (gran-ū-lom′ą-tus), a. [< granuloma(t-) + -ous.] Pertaining to, of the nature of, or affected with granuloma.

In most of the granulomatous disorders we may have not merely a diffusion of the disease throughout the individual organism, but also a transference of it from one individual to another.
Ziegler, Pathol. Anat. (trans.), i. § 117.

granulose (gran′ū-lōs), a. and n. [< granule + -ose.] I. a. Same as granular.

II. n. One of the essential constituents of the starch-grain, which gives a characteristic blue color with iodine, and is converted into sugar by the ferment of saliva. It is distinguished from the other constituent, cellulose, by these two characteristics.

Some species which contain no chlorophyll form a substance in their protoplasm, which, from its behaviour with reagents and the physiological relationships observed in certain cases, must be considered to be more or less like starch, or more correctly granulose.
De Bary, Fungi (trans.), p. 455.

granulous (gran′ū-lus), a. [< granule + -ous.] Same as granular.

granza (grän′thä), n. [Sp., usually in pl. granzas, siftings, refuse of corn, dross of metals.] [pl.] In mining, inferior ore which is obtained in small lumps, of varying sizes in different localities.

grape[1] (grāp), n. [< ME. grape, sometimes graap, a grape, also collectively in the sing., as in the pl., grapes, the bunches of grapes (= MD. grappe and krappe, a bunch of grapes), < OF. grape, grappe, crape, a bunch or cluster, esp. of grapes (cf. It. dim. grappolo, a bunch of grapes); a particular use of grape, grappe, also grafe, graffe, a hook, grappling-iron, = Pr. Sp. grapa = It. grappa, a cramp-iron (cf. E. grapple, grapnel), < OHG. chrapho, MHG. krapfe, G. krapfen, a hook, = D. krap, a clasp; connected with OHG. chrampho, chrampha, a hook, a nasalized form of the same word, = E. cramp: see cramp[1].] 1. The fruit of the vine, from which wine is made; a pulpy edible fruit or berry growing in clusters on vines of the genus Vitis.

There ben vynes that beren so grete grapes that a strong man scholde have ynow to done for to bere o [one] clustre with alle the grapes. Mandeville, Travels, p. 265.

The heathen philosopher, when he had a desire to eat a grape, would open his lips when he put it into his mouth; meaning thereby, that grapes were made to eat, and lips to open. Shak., As you Like it, v. 1.

2. The vine which produces this fruit; the grape-vine. The cultivated grape of Europe, whether it be for wine or for table use, is the Vitis vinifera, of which there are said to be 1,500 varieties. The more common native species of the United States are the chicken, frost, or winter grape, V. cordifolia, the fruit of which is small, very sour, and worthless; the riverside grape, V. vulpina; the northern fox or plum grape, V. Labrusca; the southern fox, bullace, muscadine, or scuppernong grape, V. rotundifolia; and the summer grape, V. æstivalis. The numerous cultivated table-grapes of the eastern United States are either varieties of these (as the Concord, Catawba, Isabella, Hartford Prolific, etc., derived from V. Labrusca, and the Clinton, from V. vulpina), or hybrids of these with each other or with varieties of V. vinifera (as Allen's Hybrid, the Lady Washington, etc.). The most successful wine-grapes are for the most part varieties of V. æstivalis. All the purely American varieties are remarkable for their power of resisting the attacks of the phylloxera or grape-louse, which has proved so fatal to the European vine, and on this account they have been extensively introduced into the vineyards of Europe. V. vulpina has been very largely used for this purpose, either taking the place of V. vinifera entirely or furnishing stocks upon which that species may be safely grafted. See cut under Vitis.

3. The knob at the butt of a cannon.—4. pl. In farriery, a mangy tumor on the leg of a horse.—5. Milit., grape-shot.—Black mountain grape, of Jamaica, Guettarda longiflora.—False grape, the Virginia creeper, Parthenocissus quinquefolia.—Grape-berry moth, the common name of Polychrosis or Eudemis botrana, a tortricid moth which lays its eggs in June on berries of the grape, which soon become discolored from the working of the larva inside. The larva eats the pulp and parts of the seeds of sometimes three or four berries, and transforms to a pupa in a cocoon made under a flap of leaf cut for this purpose; the moth appears in autumn as the grapes ripen.—Mountain grape, of Jamaica, Coccolobis tenuifolia.—Sea-grape. (a) The Ephedra distachya of southern Europe and Siberia. (b) The Sargassum bacciferum, a seaweed with large bladders in grape-like clusters.—Seaside grape, a name given to several species of Coccolobis growing upon the sea-shore, especially to C. uvifera.—Sour grapes, things decried as worthless only because they are beyond one's reach: in allusion to the fable of the fox which, having tried in vain to reach some grapes which grew on a high vine, went away disgusted, saying, "I don't care; they are sour, anyway."

grape[2] (grāp), v.; pret. and pp. graped, ppr. graping. A dialectal (Scotch) form of grope.

They steek their een, an' grape an' wale
For muckle anes, an' straught anes.
Burns, Halloween.

grape-cure (grāp′kūr), n. A system of medical treatment in vogue in certain parts of France, Switzerland, Germany, and Tyrol, consisting in a more or less exclusive diet of grapes.

grape-fern (grāp′fėrn), n. Any fern of the genus Botrychium: so called because the fructification somewhat resembles a cluster of grapes.

grape-flower (grāp′flou″ėr), n. An old name for the grape-hyacinth, Muscari botryoides.

grape-fruit (grāp′früt), n. The pomelo, Citrus decumana (C. Aurantium grandis, or C. decumana, of Linnæus): so called in the markets of the northern United States, probably from its grape-like flavor. It is now cultivated in Florida, Porto Rico, California, and elsewhere. See pomelo, shaddock.

grape-hyacinth (grāp′hī″ą-sinth), n. See hyacinth.

grapeless (grāp′les), a. [< grape[1] + -less.] Wanting grapes; made without grapes, as factitious wine: as, "grapeless wines," Jenyns.

grapelet (grāp′let), n. [< grape[1] + -let.] A little grape. Davies.

grape-louse (grāp′lous), n. The vine-pest or phylloxera.

grape-mildew (grāp′mil″dū), n. A fungous disease of the grape. The American or downy mildew is Plasmopara viticola, which appears in white downy patches, chiefly on the under surface of the leaves, producing brown spots on the opposite surface. It also occurs on young stems and fruits. The fructification of the fungus consists of conidia borne upon sparingly branched pinnate conidiophores, and oöspores embedded in the leaf. (See cut under conidium.) It is often very destructive in North America, and has appeared in southern Europe. The old European grape-mildew, Oidium Tuckeri, of which only the conidial fructification was for a long time known, has been found to be the conidial condition of the powdery grape-mildew of America, Uncinula necator, one of the Erysiphaceæ in which the mycelium is spread over the whole upper surface of the leaf, but does not enter its tissues, and the fructification consists of minute cleistocarpous conceptacles containing asci and spores.

graper† (grā′pėr), n. [Appar. < OF. grape, a hook, grappling-iron: see grape[1].] 1. In the fifteenth century, the roughened or studded gripe of the lance.—2. The ring or hollow cylinder of iron through which the shaft of a lance passes and by which it is seized. Compare bur[1], 6.

grape-root (grāp′röt), n. A root of the grape.—Grape-root borer. See borer.

grape-rot (grāp′rot), n. Any disease of grapes which results in the decay of the berry. The various forms of grape-rot are: black rot, due to the fungus Guignardia Bidwellii; white rot, produced by the fungus Coniothyrium Diplodiella; brown rot, caused by the fungus Plasmopara viticola; ripe rot, due to the parasite Gleosporium fructigenum; bird's-eye rot, or anthracnose, caused by the fungus Sphaceloma ampelinum. The most destructive of these rots in America is the black rot.

grapery (grā′pėr-i), n.; pl. graperies (-iz). [< grape[1] + -ery.] A building or other inclosure where grapes are grown, usually a glass-house, whether hot or cold.

She led the way to a little conservatory, and a little pinery, and a little araxery.
Miss Edgeworth, Absentee, vi.

grape-shot (grāp′shot), n. A projectile discharged from a cannon, having much of the destructive spread of case-shot with somewhat of the range and penetrative force of solid shot. A round of grape-shot consists usually of nine cast-iron balls, in three tiers, arranged between parallel iron disks connected by a central iron pin. In quilted grape-shot the balls are placed on a circular iron stand round an upright iron spindle, and are secured by a stout canvas covering fastened to the bottom plate and quilted over the balls by marlins, the upper edge of the canvas being tied round the spindle.

Grape-shot.

I therefore fired a four-pounder, charged with grape-shot, wide of them: this had a better effect.
★ Cook, Voyages, I. ii. 5.

grape-stone (grāp′stōn), n. The stone or seed of the grape.

And when obedient Nature knows his Will,
A Fly, a Grape-stone, or a Hair can kill.
Prior, Ode to George Villiers.

grape-sugar (grāp′shůg″ąr), n. Same as d-glucose. See glucose.

grape-tree (grāp′trē), n. A tree of the genus Coccolobis, as the checkered grape-tree, C. diversifolia, the mangrove grape-tree or sea-grape, C. uvifera, and the small grape-tree, C. tenuifolia. The name is derived from its characteristic grape-like berry. [West Indian.]

grape-vine (grāp′vīn), n. and a. I. n. The vine that bears grapes. See vine, Vitis.—Grape-vine thrips. See leafhopper and Erythroneura.—Grape-vine twist, a dance-figure originated at the merry-makings of negroes, and characterized by contortions in the steps and complicated turns. [U. S.]

II. a. Suited for grape-vines: an epithet applied to the poorer soil of Kentucky and Tennessee. Bartlett; De Vere.

grapewort† (grāp′wėrt), n. The baneberry, Actæa.

graph (gråf), n. [< Gr. γραφή, a writing, < γράφειν, write.] A diagrammatic representation of a system of connections by means of a number of spots, which may be all distinguished from one another, some pairs of these spots being connected by lines all of which are of one kind. In this way any system of relationship may be represented. Graphs are commonly used in chemistry, and have been applied in algebra and in logic.—Clifford's graphs, a system of graphs used for the study of invariants. These graphs were invented by J. J. Sylvester, but were further studied by W. K. Clifford.

The application of Clifford's graphs to ordinary binary quantics. Nature, XXXIII. 70.

-graph. [= D. -graaf = G. -graph = Dan. Sw. -graf = F. -graphe = Sp. -grafo = Pg. -grapho = It. -grafo, < Gr. -γραφος, -writing, -writer, < γραφή, a writing, < γράφειν, write, describe: see graphic.] A terminal element in compounds of Greek origin, denoting that which writes, marks, or describes something, as in chronograph, telegraph, seismograph, etc., or, passively, that which is written, as in autograph, electrograph, etc. In the passive use the stricter form is -gram.

graphia, n. Plural of graphium.

graphic, graphical (graf'ik, -i-kal), a. [= F. ★graphique = Sp. gráfico = Pg. graphico = It. grafico, < L. graphicus, belonging to painting or drawing, picturesque; of persons, skilful; < Gr. γραφικός, belonging to painting or drawing, picturesque, of or for writing; of style, lively; < γραφή, drawing, painting, writing, a writing, description, etc., < γράφειν, orig. scratch, scrape, graze, later represent by lines, draw, paint, write: see grave[1].] 1. Pertaining to the art of writing; concerned with writing, or with words as written; chirographic; orthographic: as, graphic representation; a mere graphic variation.

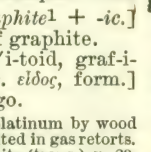
Availing himself of his poetical talent, and his facility in the graphick art. T. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, II. 157.

Long before the Alphabet had been invented, men had contrived other systems of graphic representation by means of which words could be recorded. Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, I. 2.

2. Written; inscribed; expressed by letters.



The finger of God hath left an inscription on all his works, not graphical or composed of letters. Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, ii. 2.

Graphic representations are always specially valuable to the readers. Science, III. 164.

3. Pertaining to the art of delineation, drawing, or picturing; concerned with the expression or conveyance of ideas by lines or strokes, as distinguished from alphabetic characters: as, the graphic arts.—4. Exhibiting as in a picture; representing with accuracy; describing effectively or vividly; vivid.

Pause, during which Gwendolen, having taken a rapid observation of Grandcourt, made a brief graphic description of him. George Eliot, Daniel Deronda, xi.

5. Working by drawings to scale instead of by arithmetical calculations.—6. Concerned with position, not with measurement.—Graphical geometry. See geometry.—Graphical method. (a) In math., any method of representing the relations of objects by means of the relations between the parts of a diagram. Such a method is employed, (1) in order to convey information, as when parallel lines of different length are exhibited which are proportionate to the population, etc., of different countries; and (2) to aid numerical or logical calculations, as when a curve is drawn through points whose coördinates represent the population of a country at successive decadal epochs; and this curve is used to ascertain the population at other dates. Graphical methods are of three kinds: those which make no use of the continuity of space except to show that the extremities of lines are connected, and of this kind are graphs; those which use only the projective properties of space; and those which use the metrical properties of space, and which produce diagrams intended to be measured. Of the last kind, for example, are the graphical methods of statics, etc. (b) In pathol., a mode of studying diseases of the heart and the great vessels by tracings of an instrument, as the sphygmograph. Dunglison.—Graphical statics, a method of investigating the strength of structures and other statical problems by measurements on drawings made to scale. Graphical methods are extensively employed in all branches of physical inquiry.—Graphic arts, drawing, engraving, etching, painting, and other arts involving the use of lines and strokes other than alphabetic characters, to express or convey ideas.—Graphic formula, in chem., a kind of rational formula in which the assumed valency of the atoms of a molecule, and their positions and mutual relations within the molecule, are represented by connecting lines or dashes, as in the figure, which is a graphic formula of acetic acid. Each hydrogen atom (H), having a single connecting bond, is univalent, each carbon atom (C) is quadrivalent, having four bonds, and each oxygen atom (O) bivalent. The three compound radicals of which it is composed, methyl (CH_3), carbonyl (CO), and hydroxyl (OH), are also represented.

—Graphic gold. See gold.—Graphic granite. See granite, 1.—Graphic ore. Same as graphic gold.

graphically (graf'i-kal-i), adv. 1. By means of written representation; orthographically.

After it succeeded their third dance; then which, a more numerous composition could not be seen graphically disposed into letters, and honoring the name of the most sweet and engenious Prince Charles, Duke of York. B. Jonson, Masque of Queens.

2. By means of delineation, drawing, or picturing.—3. As by a picture; vividly.

I have elsewhere called Steevens the Puck of Commentators; and I know not that I could have described him more graphically. Gifford, Int. to Ford's Plays, p. lix.

graphicalness (graf'i-kal-nes), n. The condition or quality of being graphic. Imp. Dict.

graphicly (graf'ik-li), adv. Same as graphically.

graphicness (graf'ik-nes), n. Same as graphicalness.

But seeing the actual reality takes away much of the pleasantness, however much it adds to the graphicness. E. Sartorius, In the Soudan, p. 28.

graphics (graf'iks), n. [Pl. of graphic: see -ics.] The art of drawing, particularly of precise mechanical drawing, as of architectural and engineering plans.

Graphidaceæ (graf-i-dā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Graphis (Graphid-) + -aceæ.] A family of lichens, remarkable for the resemblance which the fructification (apothecia) bears to the forms of certain Oriental alphabets, whence the scientific name and the popular name *scripturewort*s. The species are widely distributed, growing chiefly on the bark of trees. The apothecia are usually elongated (lirellæform) and normally margined only by a proper exciple. Graphis is the typical genus. Some of the species are peculiarly important from being found only as parasites on the bark of particular species of Cinchona, and so serving as a means of identifying some of the most valuable commercial barks. Also written Graphidiaceæ, Graphidei, and Graphideæ.

graphidaceous (graf-i-dā'shius), a. [< Graphis (Graphid-) + -aceous.] In lichenol., belonging to the genus Graphis or to the family Graphidaceæ. Also graphideine.

graphideine (grā-fid'ē-in), a. [< Graphis (Graphid-) + -ine[1].] Same as graphidaceous.

graphiohexaster (graf″i-ō-hek-sas'tėr), n. [< Gr. γραφεῖον, a style, + ἑξ, = E. six, + ἀστήρ, star.] In sponges, a hexaster or six-rayed spicule whose rays are much curved.

graphiology (graf-i-ol'ō-ji), n. [< Gr. γραφεῖον, a style, pencil, LGr. γραφεία, writings (see graphium), + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The study of handwriting as an expression of character.

Graphis (graf'is), n. [NL., < L. graphis, < Gr. γραφίς (γραφιδ-), a style, pencil, drawing, < γράφειν, write: see graphic.] A genus of lichens having the apothecia curved and branched, found chiefly on the bark of trees. See Graphidaceæ.

★graphite[1] (graf'īt), n. [= F. graphite, so called from its use in making pencils for writing, < Gr. γραφή, writing, + -ite[2].] One of the forms under which carbon occurs in nature (see carbon), also known as plumbago and black-lead. It has an iron-gray color and metallic luster, and occurs in foliated masses and embedded scales. It is soft and unctuous to the touch, makes a black shining streak on paper, and is used chiefly in the manufacture of pencils, crucibles, and portable furnaces, for burnishing iron to protect it from rust, as a lubricator, for electrodes in electro-metallurgy, for making conducting surfaces in electro-plating, etc. The graphite of commerce is largely obtained from Ceylon, also from mines in the United States (e. g. Ticonderoga, N. Y.), Mexico, Austria, Germany, etc. The Alibert mine in Siberia has produced excellent material for lead pencils. Artificial graphite, which can be made by a variety of processes, is now produced in quantity for commercial uses by the decomposition of a carbide by the heat of a powerful electrical current.—Gas-graphite. Same as gas-carbon (which see, under carbon).

graphite[2] (graf'īt), n. [An erroneously 'restored' form, for graffite*, < It. graffito, pl. graffiti: see graffito.] Same as graffito. See the extract.

The next [in the catacomb under the farm of Tor Marancia near Rome] was a graphite, one of those rude scratchings which, though made by idle or mischievous hands, . . . nevertheless often contain most valuable information. This graphite was found on the intonaco [plaster] of the apse. It represented in rude outline the profile of a bishop seated, evidently preaching from the episcopal chair, with a kind of background showing the side of the choir, with the pulpit or ambo for the epistle. Shakspeare Wood.

Grove had proposed to replace the platinum by wood charcoal or graphitoidal charcoal deposited in gas retorts. Hospitalier, Electricity (trans.), p. 23.

graphium (graf'i-um), n.; pl. graphia (-ą). [L., < Gr. γραφεῖον, a pencil, style, < γράφειν, write: see graphic, graff[2].] A style for writing; a stylus.

graphiure (graf'i-ūr), n. A dormouse of the genus Graphiurus.

Graphiurus (graf-i-ū'rus), n. [NL., < Gr. γραφεῖον, a pencil, + οὐρά, tail.] 1. A genus of dormice, of the family Myoxidæ, with a short cylindrical tail ending in a pencil of hairs (whence the name), and small simple molars. F. Cuvier, 1829.—2. A genus of extinct fishes, of the family Cœlacanthidæ. Kner, 1866.

grapholite (graf'ō-līt), n. [< Gr. γραφή, writing, + λίθος, stone.] A kind of slate suitable for writing on.

Grapholitha (gra-fol'i-thą), n. [NL. (Treitschke, 1829), < Gr. γραφή, writing, + λίθος, stone. Cf. graptolite.] A genus of small and peculiarly marked tortricid moths, some of which inhabit galls. The larva of G. caryana of the United States feeds on the husks of hickory-nuts; G. prunivora infests plums and also aphid-galls; G. interstinctana affects clover-seeds. There are 14 North American and a number of European species.

graphological (graf-ō-loj'i-kal), a. [< graphology + -ic-al.] Pertaining to graphology.

graphologist (grā-fol'ō-jist), n. [< graphology + -ist.] One who is skilled in graphology.

When told that he is a miser, he [a hypnotized person] writes in a close, short, economical hand-writing, in the way misers write according to graphologists; as a peasant, he writes in a drawling ugly hand. Science, VII. 302.

graphology (grā-fol'ō-ji), n. [< Gr. γραφή, writing, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The study of handwriting regarded as an expression of the character of the writer.

The conclusion drawn by these gentlemen is, that graphology is a real science, and that its main features are correct, generally speaking. Science, VII. 302.

graphometer (grā-fom'e-tėr), n. [< Gr. γράφειν, write, + μέτρον, a measure.] A mathematical instrument for measuring angles in surveying; a semicircle.

graphometric, graphometrical (graf-ō-met'rik, -ri-kal), a. [< graphometer + -ic-al.] 1. Pertaining to or ascertained by a graphometer.—2. Pertaining to graphometrics.—Graphometric function, a function expressed by means of length but unaltered by linear transformation.

graphometrics (graf-ō-met'riks), n. [Pl. of graphometric: see -ics.] That branch of geometry which treats of properties which involve lengths or other magnitudes, but which are unaltered by projection or linear transformation.

graphonym (graf'ō-nim), n. [< Gr. γραφή, writing, + ὄνομα, ὄνυμα, a name: see onym.] In zoöl. and bot., a technical name based upon a recognizable published plate, figure, diagnosis, or description. Coues, The Auk (1884), I. 321. [Rare.]

graphophone (graf'ō-fōn), n. [< Gr. γραφή, writing, + φωνή, a sound.] An instrument for recording and reproducing sounds, based on the principle of the phonograph invented by Edison, but of a different mechanical construction. More fully called phonograph-graphophone.

The gramophone bears no resemblance, in a scientific aspect, to the phonograph, or the graphophone. Elect. Rev. (Eng.), XXIII. 625.

graphophonic (graf-ō-fon'ik), a. [< graphophone + -ic.] Pertaining to the graphophone: as, a graphophonic tablet.

graphoscope (graf'ō-skōp), n. [< Gr. γραφή, writing, + σκοπεῖν, view.] A device for viewing pictures or photographs through a lens. It consists of a holder for the picture and one for the lens, with simple appliances for adjusting the focus.

graphospasm (graf'ō-spazm), n. [< NL. graphospasmus, < Gr. γραφή, writing, + σπασμός, spasm, cramp: see spasm.] Writers' cramp; scriveners' cramp (which see, under scrivener).

★graphotype (graf'ō-tīp), n. [< Gr. γραφή, writing, + τύπος, impression: see type.] A process of making blocks for use in surface-printing. Drawings are made on a thin surface of finely prepared chalk with a silicious ink. When dried, the soft parts are brushed away, and the drawing remains in relief; stereotypes are then made from the block. In a later form of the process the chalk surface is superseded by a zinc plate covered with finely powdered French chalk brought to a hard and firm texture by great pressure.

-graphy. [= D. -grafie = G. -graphie = Dan. Sw. -grafi = F. -graphie = Sp. -grafía = Pg. -graphia = It. -grafia, < L. -graphia, < Gr. -γραφία, in abstract nouns from compound adjectives in -γραφος, < γράφειν, write: see -graph.] A terminal element in compound words of Greek origin, meaning 'writing, description, discourse, science,' as in biography, geography, hagiography, hydrography, topography, typography, etc. Such nouns are accompanied by an adjective in -graphic, -graphical, and often by a concrete noun in -graph.

grapline (grap'lin), n. Naut., same as grapnel, 3.

grapnall†, n. See grapnel.

grapnel (grap'nel), n. [Formerly also grapnall; < ME. grapenel, grapinel, < OF. grapinel, grappinel, assumed dim. of grapin, grappin, F. grappin, a grapnel (OF. also grappil, a grapnel, grapple), dim. of grappe, a hook, a cluster of grapes: see grape[1].] 1. A mechanical device consisting essentially of one or more hooks or clamps, used for grasping or holding something; a grapple; a grappling-iron. Specifically—2. A grappling-iron, used to seize and hold one ship to another in engagements preparatory to boarding. Also called grappling.

Grapnel, def. 3.

In goth the grapenel, so ful of crokes,
Amonge the ropes, and the sheryng hokes.
Chaucer, Good Women, l. 640.

3. A boat's anchor having from three to six flukes placed at equal distances about the end of the shank. Also grapline.

After this a canoe was left fixed to a grapnel in the middle of the harbour. Anson, Voyage Round the World, ii. 13.

4. A kind of heavy tongs used for hauling logs, stones, etc. E. H. Knight.—5. A device for grasping or taking hold of something not otherwise manageable or accessible, as for gripping and recovering tools in a bored well, for raising the core left by a diamond drill, for seizing a submarine telegraph-cable which needs repairs, etc.

grapnel-plant (grap'nel-plant), n. Same as ★grapple-plant.

grapple (grap'l), n. [Early mod. E. also graple; < OF. grappil, a grapple (of a ship), equiv. to grappin (> dim. grappinel*, > E. grapnel, q. v.), dim. of grappe, a hook, a cluster of grapes: see grape[1] and grapple, v.] 1. A hook or an iron instrument by which one thing, as a ship, fastens on another; a grapnel.

Ambition outsearcheth to glorie the greece,
The stair to estate, the graple of grace.
Mir. for Mags., p. 84.

The creeping ivy, to prevent his fall,
Clings with its fibrous grapples to the wall.
Blackmore, Creation, ii.

2. A clasping-hook for grasping a beam, used in suspending the blocks or hoisting apparatus of a hay-fork.—3. Large tongs with sharp points used for various purposes, as for lifting blocks of ice.—4†. The clasp of a buckle. Hollyband.—5. A spring fish-hook.—6. [< grapple, v.] A seizing or gripping; especially, a close hold in wrestling, and hence in any other contest; a close fight or encounter.

Still rose . . .
Fresh from his fall, and fiercer grapple join'd.
Milton, P. R., iv. 567.

Come, one good grapple, I with all the world!
Browning, Ring and Book, II. 247.

Strangers who have a large common ground of reading will, for this reason, come the sooner to the grapple of genuine converse. R. L. Stevenson, Talk and Talkers, i.

grapple (grap'l), v.; pret. and pp. grappled, ppr. grappling. [Early mod. E. also graple, grapel; < grapple, n., q. v. Popularly associated with grab[1], grasp, with which, however, it has no connection. The freq. of grab[1] is grabble, q. v., and grasp is ult. a derivative of grope.] I. trans. To seize or grasp with a grapple; lay fast hold on with mechanical appliances or with the hands: as, to grapple an antagonist.

The gallies were grapeled to the Centurion in this manner: two lay on one side, and two on another, and the admirall lay full in the sterne.
Hakluyt's Voyages, II. ii. 168.

The friends thou hast, and their adoption tried,
Grapple them to thy soul with hoops of steel.
Shak., Hamlet, i. 3.

=Syn. To gripe, grasp, catch, clutch, clasp.

II. intrans. To fasten on another, or on each other, as ships, by some mechanical means, as grappling-irons; seize another, or each other, in a close grip, as in wrestling; clinch: often used figuratively.

Your grace and I Must grapple upon even terms no more.
Beau. and Fl., Maid's Tragedy.

Let Truth and Falsehood grapple: who ever knew Truth put to the worst in free and open encounter?
Milton, Areopagitica.

Making use only of their daggers, grappling closely man to man, till both rolled promiscuously together down the steep sides of the ravine. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., i. 13.

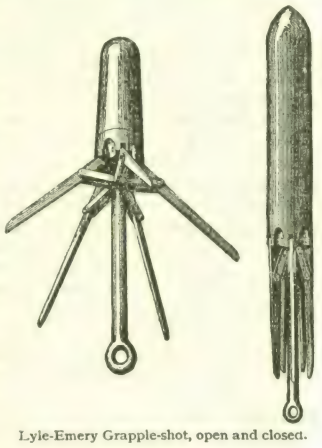
To grapple with, to contend with in close contest, as in wrestling; struggle with; seize or attack boldly.



She rubb'd her eyes; but found their strength too weak
To grapple with that stupor. J. Beaumont, Psyche, ii. 107.

grapplement† (grap'l-ment), n. [< grapple + -ment.] A grappling; a grasp; a grip.

And catching hold of him, as downe he lent,
Him backeward overthrew, and downe him stayd
With their rude handes and gryesly graplement.
Spenser, F. Q., II. xi. 29.

grapple-plant (grap'l-plant), n. A procumbent herb of South Africa, Harpagophytum procumbens, of the family Pedaliaceæ, which bears a curious seed-vessel with long, branching, claw-like appendages terminating in very sharp hooks. Also called grapnel-plant.

grapple-shot (grap'l-shot), n. A shot attached to a cable, used on the sea-coast in the life-saving service. It is fired across a ship, and is caught in the rigging by flukes which spread out when the cable is pulled.

Lyle-Emery Grapple-shot, open and closed.

grappling (grap'ling), n. [Verbal n. of grapple, v.] 1. That by which anything is seized and held; a grapnel.—2. An anchorage.

About midnight, we run under the land, and came to a grappling, where we took such rest as our situation would admit.
Cook, Voyages, I. ii. 3.

3. A lernæan parasite of the menhaden: so called from having the shape of a grappling-iron. [Maryland, U. S.]

grappling-iron (grap'ling-ī″ėrn), n. An instrument consisting of several iron or steel claws for grappling and holding fast to something.

grappling-line (grap'ling-līn), n. In zoöl., same as fishing-line, 2.

grappling-tongs (grap'ling-tôngz), n. pl. Oyster-tongs.

Grapsidæ (grap'si-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Grapsus + -idæ.] A family of brachyurous decapod crustaceans, typified by the genus Grapsus, and belonging to the series Oxypodoidea. The carapace is quadrilateral with the lateral margins straight or slightly arcuated, the orbits are moderate, and the postabdomen is very wide. The species inhabit sea-shores, and run with great rapidity.

grapsoid (grap'soid), a. and n. [< Grapsus + -oid.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Grapsoidea or Grapsidæ.

II. n. One of the Grapsoidea.

Grapsoidea (grap-soi'dē-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Grapsus + -oidea.] Same as Oxypodoidea. Also Grapsoidei.

grapsoidian (grap-soi'di-an), a. and n. [< Grapsus + -oid-ian.] Same as grapsoid.

Grapsus (grap'sus), n. [NL., for Grapsæus*, < Gr. γραψαιος, a crab.] A genus of crabs, typical of the family Grapsidæ.

Grapta (grap'tä), n. [NL. (Kirby, 1837), < Gr. γραπτός, marked, painted; with reference to the markings on the under side of the hind wings, which resemble letters or punctuation-marks.] A genus of butterflies of the family Nymphalidæ, well represented in the United States by the comma butterfly, G. comma, the semicolon butterfly, G. interrogationis, G. j.-album, and others.

Graptodera (grap-tod'e-rä), n. [NL., < Gr. γραπτός, marked, written, + δέρος, skin.] A genus of saltatorial chrysomelid beetles, or flea-beetles. G. chalybea is a small steel-blue species very injurious to the grape, of which it devours the leaves and buds.

graptolite (grap'tō-līt), n. and a. [< NL. Graptolites, Graptolithus.] I. n. One of the Graptolithidæ, Graptolithina, or Rhabdophora; a specimen or a species of Paleozoic cœlenterate organisms, commonly supposed to be hydrozoans, resembling the living sertularians in having a horny polypary, and in having the separate zoöids protected by little horny cups, all springing from a common cœnosarc, but differing in that they were not fixed to any solid object, but were permanently free. Graptolites usually appear as glistening films on hard shales of the Silurian strata, presenting the appearance of rude hieroglyphics, whence the name.

Block of Stone containing Graptolites.

Some singular organisms, termed Graptolites, which abound in the Silurian rocks, may possibly be Hydrozoa, though they present points of resemblance with the Polyzoa. . . . The theciform projections of the Graptolite stem may correspond with the nematophores of Sertularians. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 137.

Double or twin graptolites. See Graptolithidæ.

II. a. Same as graptolitic: as, a graptolite schist.

Graptolites (grap-to-lī'tēz), n. [NL., a form of Graptolithus, accom. to term. -ites, E. -ite[2].] Same as Graptolithus.

graptolith (grap'tō-lith), n. Same as graptolite.

graptolithic (grap-tō-lith'ik), a. Same as graptolitic.

Graptolithidæ (grap-tō-lith'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Graptolithus + -idæ.] The typical family of graptolites, referred to the Hydrozoa. Both the endoskeleton and exoskeleton are chitinous, the former being rod-shaped. The colonies are free-swimming. The family is probably extinct, and occurs from the Cambrian to the lower Devonian. In some forms the cellules are uniserial, on only one side of a stipe (Monoprionidæ); others have biserial cellules, and are known as double graptolites or twin graptolites (Diprionidæ). The genera are numerous. Also Graptolitidæ. See graptolite.

Graptolithina (grap-tō-li-thī'nä), n. pl. [NL., < Graptolithus + -ina.] The graptolites as a superfamily of Hydrozoa: same as Rhabdophora. The position of the group varies: it is made a subclass of Hydrozoa by Nicholson, a suborder of Hydroida by Allman, an order of gymnolæmatous Bryozoa by Carus, an order of Hydroida by Von Hayek, and a pendant to Alcyonaria by Schmarda.

Graptolithus (grap-tol'i-thus), n. [NL., < Gr. γραπτός, marked, written, verbal adj. of γράφειν, write, + λίθος, stone: see graphic.] 1†. A Linnean genus of the class Fossilia and order Petrificata, defined as a pictured petrifaction, and made to cover a variety of objects, as Florentine marble, moss-agate, certain worms, as Serpula, etc.—2. A genus of Graptolithidæ, giving name to the family.

graptolitic (grap-tō-lit'ik), a. [< graptolite + -ic.] Of or belonging to graptolites; produced by graptolites; containing graptolites: as, graptolitic markings; graptolitic slate. Also graptolite, graptolithic.

Graptolitidæ (grap-tō-lit'i-dē), n. pl. Same as Graptolithidæ or Graptolithina.

grapy (grā'pi), a. [< grape[1] + -y[1].] Composed of, pertaining to, or resembling grapes: as, a grapy flavor.

The God we now behold with open eyes;
A herd of spotted panthers round him lies
In glaring forms; the grapy clusters spread
On his fair brows, and dangle on his head.
Addison, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., iii.

graso (grā'sō), n. A cetacean of the family Balænopteridæ, Eschrichtius robustus, a kind of finner-whale.

grasp (grâsp), v. [< ME. graspen, for orig. grapsen* = LG. grapsen, grasp, snatch; with verb-formative -s, as in cleanse, bless, etc., < ME. grapien, grapen, take hold of, touch, grope: see grope[1], grape[2].] I. trans. 1. To seize and hold by clasping or embracing with the fingers or arms.

He grasp'd the mane with both his hands,
And eke with all his might.
Cowper, John Gilpin.

Dropping into his elbow-chair, and grasping its sides so firmly that they creaked again.
Dickens, Nicholas Nickleby.

His long arms stretch'd as to grasp a flyer.
Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

2. To seize upon; take possession of.

Kings, by grasping more than they could hold,
First made their subjects, by oppression, bold.
Sir J. Denham, Cooper's Hill.

3. To seize by the intellect; become thoroughly cognizant of; comprehend.

Conception, the act of which concept is the result, expresses the act of comprehending or grasping up into unity the various qualities by which an object is characterized. Sir W. Hamilton, Logic, vii.

We ourselves, indeed, when saying that we . . . grasp an argument palpably true, still express mental acts by words originally used to express bodily acts.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 68.

II. intrans. To make a grasp, or the motion of grasping; seize something firmly or eagerly.

Than he be-gan to craspe after his arme, for to take from hym his swerde out of his honde.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 649.

His hands abroad display'd, as one that grasp'd
And tugg'd for life. Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iii. 2.

Like a miser, 'midst his store,
Who grasps and grasps till he can hold no more.
Dryden.

To grasp at, to catch at; try to seize.

But this . . . is the mischievous nature of pride; it makes a man grasp at every thing, and, by consequence, comprehend nothing effectually and thoroughly.
Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, I. v.

Alas! we grasp at Clouds, and beat the Air,
Vexing that Spirit we intend to clear.
Prior, Solomon, i.

grasp (gråsp), n. [< grasp, v.] 1. A grip or seizure by the hand; the act of taking or attempting to take hold of something.

I long'd so heartily then and there
To give him the grasp of fellowship.
Tennyson, Maud, xiii. 2.

2. Power of seizing and holding; forcible possession.

I would not be the villain that thou think'st
For the whole space that's in the tyrant's grasp.
Shak., Macbeth, iv. 3.

They looked upon it as their own, and had it even within their grasp. Clarendon, Great Rebellion.

3. Power of the intellect to seize and comprehend subjects; wide-reaching power of comprehension.

The foremost minds of the following intellectual era were not, in power or grasp, equal to their predecessors.
Is. Taylor.

In the treatment of this arduous problem [the descent of man] Mr. Darwin showed no less acuteness and grasp than had been displayed in his earlier work.
J. Fiske, Evolutionist, p. 365.

graspable (gråsʹpa-bl), a. [< grasp + -able.] Capable of being grasped.

graspelt, n. and v. See grasple.

grasper (gråsʹpėr), n. 1. One who or that which grasps or seizes; one who catches or holds.—2. pl. The raptorial orthopterous mantids or rear-horses. See Raptoria.

grasping (gråsʹping), p. a. Eager to gain possession of something; covetous; rapacious; avaricious; exacting; miserly.

My wealth, on which a kinsman nigh Already casts a grasping eye.
Scott, Rokeby, iv. 28.

Stelling is moderate in his terms—he's not a grasping man. George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, i. 3.

graspingly (gråsʹping-li), adv. In a grasping manner; covetously; rapaciously.

The Pope had proved himself to be graspingly unwise.
Lowe, Bismarck, II. 357.

graspingness (gråsʹping-nes), n. The state or character of being grasping; covetousness; rapacity.

To take all that good-nature, or indulgence, or good opinion confers shews a want of moderation, and a graspingness that is unworthy of that indulgence.
Richardson, Clarissa Harlowe, I. 137.

grasplet, n. and v. [Also graspel; < grasp + -le, conformed to grapple.] Same as grapple.

For to the distourbaunce of the shippes that approched the walles, they devysed longe rafters, to the which they fastened grasples of iron and great hookes lyke sithes.
J. Brende, tr. of Quintus Curtius, fol. 60.

Wher of ye one strake full with her Spurne [rostro] with whom the cynquereme graspeled and ye other which was loose and at libertie fell vpon her contrary side.
J. Brende, tr. of Quintus Curtius, fol. 61.

graspless (gråspʹles), a. [< grasp + -less.] Incapable of grasping; relaxed; weak.

From my graspless hand
Drop friendship's precious pearls, like hour-glass sand.

★grasshopper (gràs'hop″ėr), n. [< ME. grashopper, grashoppyr (= D. grashupper = LG. grashüpper), < grashoppe, the older form (see grasshop), + -er[1].] 1. A saltatorial orthopterous insect; a popular name of those insects of the order Orthoptera of which the hind legs are fitted for leaping, and of which the males, if winged, produce a shrill, grating sound or stridulation. The name is given to numerous species, of three different families: (a) Some of the large green crickets which leap, belonging to the family Gryllidæ, as Gryllus viridissimus or Orocharis saltator. All such have very long and thready antennæ. (b) Certain of the long-horned or green grasshoppers or katydids of the family Locustidæ, having long and thready antennæ, and usually a long ovipositor in the female: more fully called and properly described as green or long-horned grasshoppers. (c) Any member of the family Acrididæ, more fully called short-horned grasshoppers, and also locusts. This is the usual popular application of the name grasshopper, but not the usual book-name, which is locust. They are comparatively slender-bodied, with wing-covers usually projecting beyond the body, and long slender legs, the hind femurs of which are enlarged. The famous locust of the old world is a true grasshopper, Pachytylus migratorius. The Rocky Mountain locust or hateful grasshopper, which commits serious ravages in the West, is Melanoplus spretus, closely related to the common red-legged grasshopper, M. femur-rubrum. (See also cut under Caloptenus.) Schistocerca americana is a large and handsome species common in the United States. The lubber-grasshopper is a large clumsy locust of the West, Brachystola magna. See cut under Brachystola.

Female Red-legged Grasshopper (Melanoplus femur-rubrum).

> Even these of them ye may eat; the locust after his kind, . . . and the grasshopper after his kind. Lev. xi. 22.
>
> For now the noonday quiet holds the hill;
> The grasshopper is silent in the grass.
> Tennyson, Œnone.

2. A young lobster. [Nantucket, Massachusetts, U. S.]—3. In pianoforte-making, the lever or jack at the back of a key which throws the hammer against the string. Also called hopper.—Green grasshopper one of the winged forms of the family Locustidæ, properly a locust, distinguished by the long and slender antennæ, and by other characters, from those members of the family Acrididæ (often called locusts) which are called grasshoppers. See locust, Locusta, Locustidæ.—Long-horned grasshopper, a green grasshopper; a member of the family Locustidæ. See def. 1 (b).—Short-horned grasshopper, an ordinary grasshopper; a member of the family Acrididæ; a locust. See def. 1 (c).

grasshopper-beam (gràs'hop-ėr-bēm), n. A form of working-beam used in some steam-engines. It is pivoted at one end to a rocking pillar, and connected with the piston-rod at the other end, a parallel motion being used to procure the proper movement of the piston-rod and the crank-connections.

Grasshopper-beam.

a, rocking pillar; b, radius-bar of the parallel motion which secures verticality to the piston-rod.

grasshopper-engine (gràs'hop-ėr-en″jin), n. A form of steam-engine in which the working-beam is linked to the crank at the middle, and to the supporting center at one end.

grass-oil (gràs'oil), n. A name given to the fragrant oils procured in India by distillation from several species of Andropogon, especially A. Nardus, yielding citronella-oil, A. citratus, yielding lemon-grass oil or oil of verbena, and A. schœnanthus, from which is obtained oil of ginger-grass or oil of geranium. They are used chiefly in perfumery.

grassont, n. Same as gersome.

grass-parrakeet (gràs'par″a-kēt), n. A parrakeet of the genus Melopsittacus or Euphema. The best-known species is M. undulatus, one of the parrakeets most commonly seen in confinement, and more fully called zebra grass-parrakeet. It is a native of Australia, and notable for warbling or twittering a few musical notes, whence the generic name. It is a very pretty bird, about 7 inches long, of slender form, with a long, thin, pointed tail. The under parts are uniform bright green, and the upper parts are mostly undulated with yellow and blackish curved cross-bars; the face is yellow, with several small steel-blue spots; the tail is party-colored, and inclining to blue on the middle pair of feathers. These little birds bear confinement well, become very tame, and make interesting pets. They are regularly exported from Australia, and much has been written upon their breeding in confinement. This is the only species of its genus; but those of Euphema are seven. See cut under Euphema.

grass-plot, grass-plat (gràs'plot, -plat), n. A plot or spot covered with grass, sometimes, in ornamental grounds, with small beds of flowers interspersed.

> The queen o' the sky . . .
> Bids thee leave these; and with her sovereign grace,
> Here on this grass-plot, in this very place,
> To come and sport. Shak., Tempest, iv. 1.

The threshold grates the door to have him heard.
Shak., Lucrece, l. 306.

2. To reduce to small particles by rubbing or rasping with something rough or indented: as, to grate a nutmeg or the peel of a lemon.

When water-drops have worn the stones of Troy, . . .
And mighty states characterless are grated
To dusty nothing. Shak., T. and C., iii. 2.

Grate it [horse-radish] on a grater which has no bottom.
Evelyn, Acetaria.

3. To affect harshly and painfully, as if by abrasion; fret.

Thereat enraged, soone he gan upstart,
Grinding his teeth, and grating his great hart.
Spenser, Mother Hub. Tale, l. 1334.

I knew before
'Twould grate your ears; but it was base in you
To urge a weighty secret from your friend,
And then rage at it.
Beau. and Fl., Maid's Tragedy, iii. 2.

4. To produce a harsh or jarring sound of, as by the friction of rough bodies.

Open fly . . .
The infernal doors, and on their hinges grate
Harsh thunder. Milton, P. L., ii. 881.

5†. To scratch or scrape with; use for attrition or abrasion.

Was I a man, ere I
Would live in poor estate,
On father, friends, and all my kin
I would my talons grate.
George Barnwell (Child's Ballads, VIII. 224).

II. intrans. 1. To make a harsh or rasping sound by friction or attrition; give out a scraping noise.

They ran togider, and tainted eche other on ye helmes, but their speres grated nat.

Turning softly like a thief,
Lest the harsh shingle should grate underfoot.
Tennyson, Enoch Arden.

2. To produce a harsh impression; cause irritation or chafing.

Oh that unwelcome voice of heavenly love, . . .
How does it grate upon his thankless ear!
Cowper, Truth, l. 465.

grate[1]† (grāt), n. [< ME. grate; from the verb.] ★A grater. Prompt. Parv., p. 207.

grate[2] (grāt), n. [< ME. grate, a trellis, lattice. Cf. It. grate, a grate, lattice, gridiron, < ML. grata, a grating, var. of crata, a grating, a crate, < L. cratis, a hurdle: see crate and hurdle.] 1. A partition made with bars parallel to or crossing one another; a framework of bars in a door, window, hatchway, or other opening.

At last he came unto an yron doore; . . .
But in the same a little grate was pight,
Through which he sent his voyce, and lowd did call.
Spenser, F. Q., I. viii. 37.

The English in the suburbs close intrench'd, Wont, through a secret grate of iron bars
In yonder tower, to overpeer the city.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., i. 4.

2. (a) A frame of metal bars in which fuel is burned, especially coal.

I sat beside the glowing grate, fresh heaped With Newport coal.
Bryant, Meditation on Rhode Island Coal.

(b) The floor of a fire-box or furnace, formed of a series or group of bars; the bottom of a furnace, on which the fuel rests, and through which it is supplied with air.—3. In metal.: (a) A perforated metal plate used in the stamping of ores, through which the pounded ore passes. (b) A screen. [Eng.]—Revolving grate. (a) A grate which revolves so as to expose different parts in turn to the feed-opening. (b) An ore-roasting furnace with a grate revolving horizontally. E. H. Knight.—Step-grate, in brewing, a furnace-grate consisting of a number of cast-iron plates placed horizontally, like stair-steps.

grate[2] (grāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. grated, ppr. grating. [< grate[2], n.] To furnish with a grate or grates; fill in with cross-bars: as, to grate a window.

In another place stands a columne grated about with yron, whereon they report that our Bl. Saviour was often wont to lean as he preached in the temple.
Evelyn, Memoirs, Rome, 1644.

grate[3]† (grāt), a. [< L. gratus, pleasing, agreeable: see grace, n. Hence grateful, and (from L. gratus) ult. ingrate, gratify, gratitude, gratuity, gratulate, etc., greet[2], agree, etc.] Pleasant; agreeable.

It becomes grate and delicious enough by custom.
Sir T. Herbert, Travels in Africa, p. 311.

grateful (grāt'fůl), a. [< grate[3] + -ful; an irreg. formation.] 1. Pleasing to the mind or the senses; agreeable; gratifying; affording pleasure.

If you will do a grateful office to me,
In person give this paper to a gentleman.
Shirley, Love in a Maze, ii. 1.

Now golden fruits on loaded branches shine,
And grateful clusters swell with floods of wine.
Pope, Autumn, l. 74.

The occupation [of watching sheep] was grateful to his mind, for its freedom, innocency, and solitude.
Bancroft, Hist. U. S., II. 331.

2. Betokening or expressing gratitude; denoting thankfulness.

So many grateful altars I would rear
Of grassy turf, and pile up every stone
Of lustre from the brook, in memory
Or monument to ages. Milton, P. L., xi. 323.

Leave on Swift this grateful verse engraved,
"The rights a court attack'd, a poet saved."
Pope, Imit. of Horace, II. i. 223.

3. Feeling kindly or tenderly on account of a favor or favors bestowed; disposed to acknowledge and repay benefits.

My life has crept so long on a broken wing . . .
That I come to be grateful at last for a little thing.
Tennyson, Maud, xxviii.

=Syn. 3. Grateful, Thankful, beholden. Grateful is preferred when we speak of the general character of a person's mind: as, a man of a grateful disposition; an ungrateful wretch. Grateful often expresses the feeling, and the readiness to manifest the feeling by acts, even a long time after the rendering of the favor; thankful refers rather to the immediate acknowledgment of the favor by words. The same distinction is found in the negative forms, ungrateful, unthankful, thankless. Thankful is often loosely used for relieved or glad, where the thanks, if rendered, would be given to a merciful or helping Providence: as, I am thankful for my escape.

A grateful beast will stand upon record against those that in their prosperity forget their friends.
Sir R. L'Estrange.

To find one thankful man, I will oblige many that are not so. Seneca (trans.).

gratefully (grāt'fůl-i), adv. 1. With gratitude or thankfulness.

'Twas God himself that here tun'd every tongue,
And gratefully of Him alone they sung.
Cowley, Davideis.

2. In a grateful, agreeable, or pleasing manner.

Study detains the mind by the perpetual occurrence of something new, which may gratefully strike the imagination. Watts.

gratefulness (grāt'fůl-nes), n. 1. Gratitude; thankfulness.

And meerly out of gratefulness, in remembrance of the many courtesies done to him before by David King of Scots, he left him the country of Huntingdon.
Baker, Hen. II., an. 1155.

2. The state or quality of being grateful, agreeable, or pleasing.

grater (grā'tėr), n. One who or that which grates. Specifically—(a) An instrument or utensil with a rough indented surface for rubbing off fine particles of a body: as, a nutmeg-grater. (b) In bookbinding, an iron instrument used by the forwarder to rub the backs of sewed books after pasting.

grate-room (grāt'rōm), n. In some forms of furnace, a compartment or chamber with a grate beneath it, separated from the rest of the furnace, in which the fire is made.

These grate-rooms are sunk several feet below the level of the bed of the furnace, and are separated from each other by a portion of the bed, which is called the flag.
Glass-making, p. 111.

grate-surface (grāt'sėr″fās), n. The area of any grate in a furnace. In steam-engineering the term is used in designating the extent of surface required in a grate to hold sufficient fuel to evaporate a given weight of water, and thus indirectly to produce a certain amount of power. Thus, in a locomotive-boiler one square foot of grate-surface is assumed to suffice for the evaporation of five hundred pounds of water per hour. Ordinary forms of boilers are much less effective; some do not evaporate per hour as much as one hundred pounds per square foot of grate-surface.

gratiate†, v. t. [< ML. gratiatus, pp. of gratiare, favor, exempt, also thank, < L. gratia, favor, grace: see grace.] To favor.

We are to take notice of the continued peace and plenty with which not only these three years, restrictively considered, but also for many years together, both before and after them, New England was so marvellously gratiated.
N. Morton, New England's Memorial, p. 215.

graticulation (grā-tik-ū-lā'shọn), n. [F. graticulation, craticulation, < graticuler, craticuler, divide into squares, < graticule, craticule: see graticule.] The division of a design or draft into squares, as an aid in producing a copy of it in larger or smaller dimensions.

graticule (grat'i-kūl), n. [< F. graticule, craticule, < L. craticula, dim. of cratis, a hurdle, wickerwork: see grate[2], crate.] A design or draft divided into squares to facilitate copying.

To illustrate this, I have drawn out upon the same scale, on the same graticule, with common parallels, and with the assumption of the same meridian, . . . the skeleton of the general map. Yule.

The graticule is sometimes rectangular, sometimes spherical, sometimes a combination of both, as when points of which the latitude and longitude coördinates are given have to be plotted within rectangular marginal lines. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 714.

★gratification (grat″i-fi-kā'shọn), n. [= F. gratification = Sp. gratificación = Pg. gratificação = It. gratificazione, < L. gratificatio(n-), < gratificare, gratificari, please, gratify: see gratify.] 1. The act of gratifying or pleasing; a pleasing or satisfying.

He never tells his disciples . . . that the pleasure of humane life lies in the gratification of the senses, and in making what use they can of the world.
Stillingfleet, Works, I. v.

Their minds are bent upon the little gratifications of their own senses and appetites.
Steele, Spectator, No. 152.

2. The state of being gratified; pleasure received; delectation; satisfaction.

I thought it of great use, if they [readers] could learn with me to keep their minds open to gratification, and ready to receive it from any thing it meets with.
Steele, Spectator, No. 454.

Nothing severe was injoined by Mahomet, and the frequent prayers and washings with water which he directed were gratifications to a sedentary people in a very hot country. Bruce, Source of the Nile, I. 520.

3. Voluntary reward or recompense; also, a gratuity for services received or expected.

This sheik [at Shirbey] usually goes with the Europeans to the valley of salt, but not without a proper gratification. Pococke, Description of the East, II. i. 168.

The Duke of Lerma . . . let you languish several months without giving you one pistole; whereas the count has already bestowed upon you a gratification which you could not have expected till after long service.
Smollett, tr. of Gil Blas, xi. 6.

gratifier (grat'i-fī-ėr), n. 1. One who or that which gratifies or pleases.

He had under him in one of his dominions a briber, a gift-taker, a gratifier of rich men.
Latimer, 3d Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1549.

Bacchus, Ceres, and other eminent persons among the heathens, who were great gratifiers of the natural life of man. Dr. H. More, Mystery of Godliness, p. 169.

2†. One who makes gifts.

gratify (grat'i-fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. gratified, ppr. gratifying. [< F. gratifier = Sp. Pg. gratificar = It. gratificare, < L. gratificare, gratificari, do a favor to, oblige, please, gratify (cf. LL. gratificus, kind, obliging), < gratus, kind, pleasing, + facere, make: see grate[3] and -fy.] 1. To please; give pleasure to; delight; satisfy; indulge.

They [Romanists] are provided one way or other to gratifie persons of all inclinations. Stillingfleet, Sermons, II. i.

Every man has tastes and propensities, which he is disposed to gratify at a risk and expense which people of different temperaments and habits think extravagant.
Macaulay, Utilitarian Theory of Government.

Where is the man who does not persuade himself when he gratifies his own curiosity he does so for the sake of his womankind? Miss Yonge, Unknown to History, ix.

2. To requite or reward voluntarily; also, to give a gratuity to. [Archaic.]

Some carrying about water in leather bagges, gluing it to all, and demanding nothing for the same, except any voluntarily gratifie them. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 307.

I know not how to gratify your kindness; wherefore, pray, as a token of my respects to you, accept of this small mite. Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, ii.

He wished to have them first taught swimming, and proposed to gratify me handsomely if I would teach them.
Franklin, Autobiog., p. 86.

=Syn. 1. Gratify, Indulge, Humor. To gratify is a more positive act than to indulge or to humor. Gratify is most often used in a good sense; indulge, most often in a bad one. Humor expresses an easy or good-natured compliance or management, ordinarily neither weak nor evil: as, to humor a person's eccentricities.

Not food, and tools, and clothing, and decorations only, gratify the love of acquisition.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 515.

Nature will sometimes indulge herself with a leap, but as a rule her march is slow and gradual.
Darwin, Var. of Animals and Plants, p. 395.

To after age thou shalt be writ the man
That with smooth air couldst humour best our tongue.
Milton, Sonnets, viii.

gratifyingly (grat'i-fī-ing-li), adv. In a gratifying or pleasing manner.

gratillity† (grā-til'i-ti), n. In the extract, a humorous perversion of gratuity. [Unique.]

Sir And. I sent thee sixpence for thy leman; Hadst it?
Clo. I did impeticos thy gratillity.
Shak., T. N., ii. 3.

grating[1] (grā'ting), n. [Verbal n. of grate[1], v.] The act of rubbing harshly; the harsh sound caused by the rasping or scraping of hard, rough bodies; the feeling produced by harsh attrition.

The contrary is called harshness, such as is grating, and some other sounds. Hobbes, Human Nature, vii.

The tenderer ear cannot but feel the rude thumpings of the wood, and gratings of the rosin, . . . in the best consorts of musical instruments.
Dr. H. More, Immortal. of Soul, iii. 9.

grating[1] (grā'ting), p. a. [Ppr. of grate[1], v.] Harsh; rasping; fretting; irritating: as, grating sounds; a grating temper.

And grating shock of wrathful iron arms.
Shak., Rich. II., i. 3.

★grating[2] (grā'ting), n. [< grate[2] + -ing[1].] 1. A partition or frame of parallel or crossing bars; an open latticework of wood or metal serving as a cover or guard, but admitting light, air, etc., as in the fair-weather hatches of a ship, the cover of the mouth of a drain or sewer, etc.

We were admitted to an apartment about ten feet long by five wide, with a very thick double grating, behind which some of the nuns appeared and chattered.
Greville, Memoirs, April 22, 1830.

Probably soundly flogged at the gratings when recaptured, or when in a spirit of penitence they returned to duty. N. and Q., 7th ser., VI. 437.

2. In optics: (a) An arrangement of parallel wires in a plane, designed to produce spectra by diffraction: specifically called a real grating. (b) A series of fine parallel lines on a plane or concave surface of glass or polished metal ruled very close together, at the rate of 10,000 to 20,000, or even 40,000, to the inch: distinctively called a diffraction grating. Such gratings are much used in spectroscopic work. The first really fine gratings were those of L. M. Rutherfurd of New York, but Rowland's gratings are more recent and distinctly superior. See diffraction, 1, and spectrum.

In making gratings for optical purposes the periodic error must be very perfectly eliminated, since the periodic displacement of the lines only one-millionth of an inch from their mean position will produce "ghosts" in the spectrum. Encyc. Brit., XXI. 553.

3. A timber framework consisting of beams which cross one another at right angles to support the foundation of a heavy building in light, loose soil.—4. In metal., the act of separating large from small ore. See grate[2], n., 3.—Grating deck, a light deck made of grating.—Grating spectrum, a diffraction spectrum produced by a grating.

gratingly (grā'ting-li), adv. In a grating manner; harshly; offensively.

Gratiola (grā-tī'ō-lä), n. [NL., named in allusion to its supposed medicinal virtues, < L. gratia, grace: see grace.] A genus of low scrophulariaceous herbs, containing about 25 species, widely distributed in temperate regions, 12 being native in the United States. They have opposite leaves and small solitary axillary flowers. The hedge-hyssop, G. officinalis, of Europe and northern Asia, has a bitter, acrid taste, and is employed in medicine as a drastic purgative in the treatment of dropsy.

gratiosa (grā-ti-ō'sä), a. In music, same as grazioso.

gratioso†, n. Same as gracioso.

gratious†, a. An obsolete spelling of gracious. Spenser.

gratis (grā'tis), adv. [= D. G. Dan. Sw. F. gratis = Sp. gratis = Pg. It. gratis, < L. gratis, contr. of earlier gratiis, for nothing, without reward, lit. by favor or kindness, abl. pl. of gratia, favor: see grace.] For nothing; freely; without pay: as, to perform service gratis.

Having once paid this Caphar, you may go in and out gratis as often as you please during the whole Feast.
Maundrell, Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 67.

The price, after the first four numbers, which were given away gratis, was a penny.
A. Dobson, Int. to Steele, p. xxvii.

Appearing gratis. See appear.

gratis (grā'tis), a. [< gratis, adv.] Gratuitous. [An inaccurate use.]

In its ultimate form, . . . altruism will be the achievement of gratification, . . . sympathetic gratification which costs the receiver nothing, but is a gratis addition to his egoistic gratifications. H. Spencer, Data of Ethics, p. 255.

gratitude (grat'i-tūd), n. [< F. gratitude = Sp. gratitud = It. gratitudine, < ML. gratitudo, thankfulness, < L. gratus, thankful: see grate[3], grace.] The state or quality of being grateful or thankful; a warm and friendly feeling in response to a favor or favors received; thankfulness.

In the first place, it may be asked whether we are only bound to repay services, or whether we owe the special affection called Gratitude; which seems generally to combine kindly feeling with some sort of emotional recognition of superiority.
H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 232.

A feeling of gratitude, or of resentment, tends to be deepened. J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 484.

=Syn. See grateful.

grattoir (gra-twor'), n. [F., a scraper, < gratter, scratch, scrape: see grate[1].] In archæol., an instrument of the stone age, of chipped flint or other stone, sharpened at one edge, around the greater part of its circumference, or at two opposite edges, presumably used for scraping skins, etc.; a scraper.

Amer. Antiquarian, IX. 341.

gratuitous (grā-tū'i-tus), a. [= F. gratuit = Sp. gratuito = Pg. It. gratuito, < L. gratuitus, that is done without pay, free, spontaneous, < gratia, favor, gratus, showing favor: see grace, and cf. gratis.] 1. Freely bestowed or obtained; costing nothing to the recipient.

The city was gradually crowded with a populace . . . tempted with the cheap or gratuitous distribution of corn. J. Adams, Works, IV. 538.

Numerous public baths were established, to which, when they were not absolutely gratuitous, the smallest coin in use gave admission, and which were in consequence habitually employed by the poor.
Lecky, Europ. Morals, II. 81.

2. Unnecessary; not required; not warranted by circumstances or reason; uncalled for: as, a gratuitous insult.

The second motive they had to introduce this gratuitous declination of atoms, the same poet gives us. Ray.

The assumption is a purely gratuitous one.
H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 223.

Gratuitous conveyance or deed. See conveyance.
=Syn. 1. Unpaid, unpurchased.—2. Unwarranted, unnecessary, groundless.

gratuitously (grā-tū'i-tus-li), adv. 1. In a gratuitous manner; without cost to the recipient; freely.

Distributions of corn . . . frequently made to the people, either gratuitously or at a very low price.
Adam Smith, Wealth of Nations, I. xi. 1.

2. Without sufficient cause or reason: as, a principle gratuitously assumed.

The assumption that the primitive man gratuitously acts in an irrational way is quite inadmissible.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 145.

gratuitousness (grā-tū'i-tus-nes), n. The quality or condition of being gratuitous.

★gratuity (grā-tū'i-ti), n.; pl. gratuities (-tiz). [< OF. gratuite, F. gratuité, < ML. gratuita(t-)s, a free gift, < L. gratuitus, freely given, free: see gratuitous.] That which is given without claim or demand; a free gift; a donation.

In these expeditions I often met some Arabs on horseback, who would voluntarily offer to guard me to the gate of the city, in order to get a small gratuity.
Pococke, Description of the East, I. 10.

Promising them their whole arrears, constant pay, and a present gratuity. Ludlow, Memoirs, II. 330.

=Syn. Gift, Donation, etc. See present.

gratulance† (grat'ū-lans), n. [< gratulan(t) + -ce.] Pecuniary gratification; a fee, bribe, or bonus.

Come, there is
Some odd disburse, some bribe, some gratulance,
Which makes you lock up leisure.
Machin, Dumb Knight, v.

gratulant (grat'ū-lant), a. [< L. gratulan(t-)s, ppr. of gratulari, wish one joy: see gratulate.] Expressing pleasure or joy; congratulatory. [Rare.]

The white-robed multitude of slaughtered saints
At Heaven's wide-opened portals gratulant Receive some martyred Patriot.
Coleridge, Destiny of Nations.

gratulate (grat'ū-lāt), v.; pret. and pp. gratulated, ppr. gratulating. [< L. gratulatus, pp. of gratulari (> Sp. Pg. gratular = It. (refl.) gratular = OF. gratuler = G. gratuliren = Dan. gratulere = Sw. gratulera), wish one joy, congratulate, < gratus, pleasing, agreeable: see grace, grate[3]. Cf. congratulate.] I. trans. 1. To congratulate; express joy to or on account of. [Now rare.]

Hail, noblest Romans! The most worthy consul,
I gratulate your honour. B. Jonson, Catiline, iii. 1.

In all our names? Fletcher, Beggar's Bush, ii. 1.

Graucalus (grâ'kạ-lus), n. [NL. (Cuvier, 1817, but first in Linnæus, 1735), appar. a perversion of L. graculus, a jackdaw, grackle: see Graculus, etc.] A Cuvierian genus of campophagine birds. Also called Ceblepyris and Coracina.

graunt-merci†, interj. An earlier form of gramercy. Chaucer.

grauwacke, n. See graywacke.

gravamen (grā-vā'men), n.; pl. gravamina (-vam'i-nä). [LL., trouble, physical inconvenience, lit. burden, < L. gravare, weigh down, load, burden, < gravis, heavy: see grave[3].] 1. The burden or chief weight; that part of an accusation which weighs most heavily against the accused; the substantial cause of an action at law; ground or burden of complaint in general.

It is not safe nor charitable to extend the gravamen and punishment beyond the instances the apostles make.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 301.

I believe that the real gravamen of the charges [against Democracy] lies in the habit it has of making itself generally disagreeable, by asking the powers that be at the most inconvenient moment whether they are the powers that ought to be. Lowell, Democracy.

2. In the Ch. of Eng., a representation by the lower house of Convocation to the upper of an existing grievance, disorder, or inconvenience affecting the church. A gravamen, accompanied by a reformandum or resolution embodying action intended to remedy the trouble indicated, becomes, as adopted by the house, an articulus cleri. If agreed to by the upper house (the house of bishops), that house transmits it to the Crown and Parliament with a view to its becoming law by their action and approval.

Under the first of these heads [the right of presentation by the lower house of Convocation of their own and the church's grievances to the upper house] Bishop Gibson includes the representations made by the clergy, from the very earliest accounts of the proceedings in Convocation, by the names of Gravamina and Reformanda.
Canon Trevor, The Convocations of the Two Provinces [(1852), p. 141.

gravament†, n. Same as gravamen.

Mr. Nevell shall deliver to you a bill of the gravaments of two or three of the fellows most given to good letters.
Latimer, To Cromwell (1537).

gravat (grâ'vat), n. A cravat. [Scotch.]

Tie a green gravat round his neck.
Young Benjie (Child's Ballads, II. 303).

grave[1] (grāv), v. t.; pret. graved, pp. graved or graven, ppr. graving. [< ME. graven (pret. grof, grove, pp. graven, grave, rarely weak, graved), < AS. grafan (pret. grōf, pl. grōfon, pp. grafen), dig, delve, bury, also carve, engrave (also in comp. āgrafan, inscribe, begrafan, bury), = OS. grabhan* (only in comp. bigrabhan, bury, and in deriv. graf, a grave) = OFries. greva, grova = D. MLG. LG. graven, dig, delve (in comp. D. MLG. begraven, bury), = OHG. graban, MHG. The Gr. γράφειν, scratch, scrape, graze, later draw, write, inscribe (see graphic, gram[2], grammar, etc.), is supposed to be akin. In the sense 'engrave' the E. word has merged with F. graver (> D. graveren = Dan. gravere = Sw. gravera, engrave) = Sp. grabar = Pg. gravar, < ML. gravare, grave, engrave, of Teut. origin, and not from the Gr. word; cf. engrave[1]. The Ir. grafaim, I write, inscribe, scrape, W. crafu, scrape, scratch, are prob. of E. origin. Hence grave[2], q. v.] 1. To dig; delve. [Now only prov. Eng.]

Of bodi wente thei bar, withoute any wede, & hadde grave on the ground many grete cavys.
Alexander and Dindimus, l. 6.

And next the shryne a pit than doth she grave.
Chaucer, Good Women, l. 678.

2†. To bury; entomb.

Hire metynge sholde bee
Ther [where] kyng Nynus was graven under a tree.
Chaucer, Good Women, l. 785.

In that Feld ben many Tombes of Cristene Men; for there ben manye Pilgrymes graven.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 93.

There's more gold.—
Do you damn others, and let this damn you,
And ditches grave you all. Shak., T. of A., iv. 3.

3. To cut or incise, as letters or figures, on stone or other hard substance with an edged or pointed tool; engrave.

Thou shalt take two onyx stones, and grave on them the names of the children of Israel. Ex. xxviii. 9.

Swords grave no name on the long-memoried rock
But moss shall hide it. Lowell, Voyage to Vinland.

4. To carve; sculpture; form or shape by cutting with a tool: as, to grave an image.

And [they] graueden a greate ston a God as it were,
I-corue [carved] after a Kyng full craftie of werk.
Alisaunder of Macedoine (E. E. T. S.), l. 569.

Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image.
Ex. xx. 4.

5†. To make an impression upon; impress deeply.

For ay with gold men may the herte grave
Of hym that set is upon coveitise.
Chaucer, Troilus, iv. 1377.

★grave[2] (grāv), n. [< ME. grave, grafe (prop. dat., the nom. graf producing E. dial. and Sc. graff: see graff[1]), < AS. græf, graf (dat. græfe, grafe*), a grave, also a trench (= OS. graf = OFries. gref = D. graf = MLG. LG. graf, MLG. also grave = OHG. grab, MHG. grap, G. grab, neut., a grave, = Icel. gröf, fem., a pit, hole, also a grave, = Sw. graf = Dan. grav, a grave, = Goth. graba, fem., a trench), < grafan (= Goth. graban, etc.), dig: see grave[1], v.] 1. An excavation in the earth, now especially one in which a dead body is or is to be buried; a place for the interment of a corpse; hence, a tomb; a sepulcher.

Ther is no thing thanne that saueth me
But good or yuel that y do haue.
Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 85.

In my grave which I have digged for me in the land of Canaan, there shalt thou bury me. Gen. l. 5.

The paths of glory lead but to the grave. Gray, Elegy.

2. Figuratively, any scene or occasion of utter loss, extinction, or disappearance: as, speculation is the grave of many fortunes.

But slav'ry!—Virtue dreads it as her grave:—
Patience itself is meanness in a slave.
Cowper, Charity, l. 163.

3. Sometimes, in the authorized version of the Old Testament, the abode of the dead; Hades. In the revised version the original Hebrew word Sheol is substituted in some places; in others the old rendering is retained, with Sheol in the margin; and in Ezek. xxxi. 15 hell is used instead of the grave. See hell[1].

They spend their days in wealth, and in a moment go down to the grave [revised version, "go down to Sheol"].
Job xxi. 13.

Some one walking over one's grave, an expression arising from an old superstition that an unaccountable sensation of shivering or creeping of the flesh is an omen of approaching death.

Miss (shuddering). Lord, there's somebody walking over my grave. Swift, Polite Conversation, i.

Sometimes somebody would walk over my grave, and give me a creeping in the back.
H. Kingsley, Geoffry Hamlyn, xxxi.

grave[3] (grāv), a. and n. [< F. grave = Sp. Pg. It. grave, < L. gravis, heavy, weighty, deep, low, important, serious, etc., = Gr. βαρύς, heavy (see barometer, barytone, etc.), = Skt. guru, heavy, important (see guru), = Goth. kaurs, heavy, burdensome. Hence (from L. gravis) ult. gravity, gravous, grief, grieve[1], aggravate, aggredge, aggrieve, etc.] I. a. 1†. Having weight; heavy; ponderous.

His shield grave and great. Chapman.

2. Solemn; sober; serious: opposed to light or jovial: as, a man of a grave deportment.

They were aged and graue men, and of much wisedome and experience in th' affaires of the world.
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 5.

They [the Arabs] sometimes, like the Italians, employed verse as the vehicle of instruction in grave and recondite sciences. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., i. 8.

With an aspect grave almost to sadness, . . . he addressed the two houses. Bancroft, Hist. Const., II. 362.

The sum of money which I promised . . . to his holiness,
For clothing me in these grave ornaments [a cardinal's habit]. Shak., 1 Hen. VI., v. 1.

True, it is a grave power. But what is all government but the exercise of grave powers?
W. Phillips, Speeches, p. 179.

Grave error is involved in the current notion of the present day, that no moral responsibility attaches to the result [of skeptical inquiry].
H. N. Oxenham, Short Studies, p. 276.

5. In acoustics, deep; low in pitch: opposed to acute.—Grave accent. See accent.—Grave harmonic. See harmonic.—Grave movement, in music, a slow or solemn movement.—Syn. 2. Grave, Serious, Solemn; staid, sage, sedate, thoughtful, demure. The first three words have considerable range of meaning. Serious may express the mood, look, manner, etc., that are natural when men are not in the opposite or gay and jocular mood. Grave generally goes beyond this, implying an especial seriousness, with perhaps especial reason for it. Solemn, starting from the idea of religious, covers anything that includes the idea of impressiveness or awe: as, a solemn appeal. See sober.

On him fell,
Altho' a grave and staid God-fearing man,
Yet lying thus inactive, doubt and gloom.
Tennyson, Enoch Arden.

No childish play
To me was pleasing; all my mind was set Serious to learn and know, and thence to do,
What might be public good. Milton, P. R., i. 203.

Nor wanting power to mitigate and 'suage
With solemn touches troubled thoughts.
Milton, P. L., i. 557.

Icel. greifi = Sw. grefve = Dan. greve, < LG.; and see greeve[1]) = OHG. grāfjō*, grāvo, krāvjo, krāvo, garābo, gerābo, MHG. grāve, græve, G. graf (ML. grafio, gravio, graphio), a count, prefect, governor, overseer (in OHG. also a surgeon): a name applied to various executive and judicial officers, and later as a title of rank; origin uncertain, the forms being indeterminate and their relation to the equiv. AS. gerēfa (> E. reeve[1]) doubtful. In one view, the word is derived from a lost verb represented by a deriv. in Goth. gagrēfts, gagreifts, a command; in another, the Teut. forms are derived, through the ML. graphio, in the lit. sense 'a writer,' hence 'a notary, public officer,' etc., like ML. graphiarius, F. greffier, a notary (see graff[2], greffier), from Gr. γράφειν, write (see gravel[1], graphic); and other derivations are suggested. In any case, the AS. gerēfa is unrelated, unless it stands for grēfa*: see greeve[1], reeve[1].] A count; a prefect; in Germany and the Low Countries—(a) formerly, a person holding some executive or judicial office: usually in composition with a distinctive term, as landgrave, margrave (mark-grave*), burgrave (burg-grave*), dike-grave, etc.; (b) now merely a title of rank or honor.

Upon St. Thomas's day, the palsgrave and grave Maurice were elected knights of the garter.
Baker, Chronicles, an. 1612.

Bret. grouan, gravel, Corn. grow, gravel, sand, W. gro, pebbles. Cf. also Skt. grāvan, a stone, rock.] 1. Coarse sand; a mass of pebbles or of pebbles and sand mixed; stone in a mass of small irregular fragments.—2. Specifically, in geol., the rolled and water-worn material formed from fragments of rock under the combined influence of atmospheric agencies and currents of water. Most gravel consists in large part of pebbles of quartz and crystalline rock, mixed with sand in which quartz greatly predominates, because quartz forms a large part of the most widely distributed rocks of the earth's crust, and is not readily subject to chemical change, not decomposing like feldspar and mica, but being only broken up into smaller and smaller fragments; so that there may be in the same bed components of the gravel of every size, from that of the boulder several feet in diameter down to the grain of sand not so large as a pin's head.

A welle, where-of the springes were feire and the water clere, and the grauell so feire that it semed of fyn siluer.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 308.

And he schal gadre hem into batel whos noumbre is as the gravel of the see. Wyclif, Rev. xx. 8.

Shak., T. and C., v. 1.

4. In brewing, the appearance of yeast-cells swimming in clear beer in the form of fine gravel.

It is a bad sign if the beer, on account of very fine substances suspended in it, is not transparent, when it has an appearance as if a veil was drawn over it, when no "gravel" can be perceived.
Thausing, Beer (trans.), p. 596.

Cemented gravel. See cement.—High gravels, gravels of Tertiary age, occupying the beds of ancient rivers, and left by the erosion of the present streams high above the detrital material of recent age. [California, U. S.]

It was not long before it was discovered that the so-called high gravels—that is, the detrital deposits of Tertiary age—contained gold, although the quantity was so small that washing it in the ordinary way was not profitable. Encyc. Brit., IV. 701.

gravel (grav'el), v. t.; pret. and pp. graveled or gravelled, ppr. graveling or gravelling. [< gravel, n.] 1. To cover with gravel; fill or choke with gravel: as, to gravel a walk; to gravel a fountain.

O thou, the fountain of whose better part
Is earth'd and gravell'd up with vain desire.
Quarles, Emblems, i. 7.

2. To bury. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]—3. To cause to stick in gravel or sand. [Rare.]

This mirre will I giffe to thi grauyng.
York Plays, p. 136.

2. The act of engraving, or of cutting lines or figures in metal, stone, wood, etc.—3†. That which is graved or carved; an engraving.

Skilful to work in gold, . . . also to grave any manner of graving, and to find out every device which shall be put to him. 2 Chron. ii. 14.

4. Inscription or impression, as upon the mind or heart. [Rare.]

Former gravings . . . upon their souls. Eikon Basilike.

graving[2] (grā'ving), n. [Verbal n. of grave[4], v.] The act of cleaning a ship's bottom by scraping, burning, etc.

graving-dock (grā'ving-dok), n. See dock[3].

graving-piece (grā′ving-pēs), n. In ship-building, a piece of wood inserted to supply the defects of another piece. Also called graven-piece.

★gravitate (grav′i-tāt), v. i.; pret. and pp. gravitated, ppr. gravitating. [< NL. gravitatus*, pp. of gravitare* (> It. gravitare = Sp. Pg. gravitar = F. graviter, gravitate), < L. gravita(t-)s, heaviness, gravity: see gravity.] 1. To be affected by gravitation; yield to the force of gravity; tend toward the lowest level attainable, as a rock loosened from a mountain.

It is still extremely doubtful whether the medium of light and electricity is a gravitating substance, though it is certainly material and has mass.
Clerk Maxwell, Matter and Motion, cxlv.

Hence—2. To be strongly attracted; have a natural tendency toward a certain point or object.

The goods which belong to you gravitate to you, and need not be pursued with pains and cost.
Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 285.

The colossal weight of national selfishness gravitates naturally to Toryism. Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., iii.

gravitation (grav-i-tā′shọn), n. [= D. gravitatie = G. Dan. Sw. gravitation = F. gravitation = Sp. gravitación = Pg. gravitação = It. gravitazione, < NL. gravitatio(n-), < gravitare, gravitate: see gravitate.] 1. The act of gravitating or tending toward a center of attraction.—2. That attraction between bodies, or that acceleration of one toward another, of which the fall of heavy bodies to the earth is an instance. See gravity, 1. Gravitation can be neither produced nor destroyed; it acts equally between all pairs of bodies, the force being directly proportional to the product of their masses and inversely as the square of the distance between their centers of gravity; it is neither hindered nor strengthened by any intervening medium; it is transmitted instantaneously; and the amount of it is such that a particle distant one centimeter from an attracting gram of matter would by the action of gravitation alone, were no other force present, fall into the center of attraction in 40 minutes and 20 seconds. As masses of bodies can be measured otherwise than by their weights, namely, by their relative momentums under a given velocity, it follows that the modulus of gravitation, or the amount by which the unit mass attracts a particle at the unit distance, which is invariable, best distinguishes gravitation from every other force. The laws of the attraction of gravitation were demonstrated by Sir Isaac Newton in 1687.

The most considerable phænomenon belonging to terrestrial bodies is the general action of gravitation, whereby all known bodies in the vicinity of the Earth do tend and press towards its centre. Bentley, Sermons, vii.

It is by virtue of gravitation that matter possesses weight; for the weight of any thing is the expression of the force with which it tends towards the earth.
W. L. Carpenter, Energy in Nature, p. 22.

3. In philol., the tendency of sounds and syllables having little or no stress to become merged in the accented syllable, or to fall away entirely; the absorption of weaker elements. [Rare.]—4. Figuratively, a prevailing tendency of mental or social forces or activities toward some particular point or result.—Attraction of gravitation. Same as gravitation, 2.—Gravitation constant. See constant, n.—Gravitation measure of force. See the extract.

It is sometimes convenient to compare forces with the weight of a body, and to speak of a force of so many pounds weight or grammes weight. This is called gravitation measure. Clerk Maxwell, Matter and Motion, xlvii.

Modulus of gravitation. See def. 2.—Terrestrial gravitation, gravitation toward the earth.—Universal gravitation, the gravitation of all bodies in the universe toward one another.

gravitational (grav-i-tā′shọn-ạl), a. [< gravitation + -al.] Of, pertaining to, or caused by gravitation.

Either the lunar theory is in some degree mathematically incomplete, and fails to represent accurately the gravitational action of the earth and sun, and other known heavenly bodies, upon her movements; or some unknown force other than the gravitational attractions of these bodies is operating in the case. Science, IV. 194.

gravitationally (grav-i-tā′shọn-ạl-i), adv. By gravitation, or in the manner of gravitation.

The sun's initial heat was generated by the collision of pieces of matter gravitationally attracted together from distant space. Sir W. Thomson, Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXI. 20.

gravitative (grav′i-tā-tiv), a. [< gravitate + -ive.] Of, pertaining to, or caused by gravitation; gravitating or tending to gravitate.

★gravity (grav′i-ti), n.; pl. gravities (-tiz). [= G. gravität = Dan. Sw. gravitet, < F. gravité = Sp. gravidad, gravedad = Pg. gravidade = It. gravità, < L. gravita(t-)s, weight, heaviness, pressure, < gravis, heavy: see grave[3].] 1. Weight, as contradistinguished from mass; precisely, the downward acceleration of terrestrial bodies, due to the gravitation of the earth modified by the centrifugal force due to its rotation on its axis. The amount of this acceleration is about 385.1 inches (978 centimeters) per second at the sea-level and the equator, while at the poles it is 387.1 inches. Gravity is a little less on mountains than at the sea-level, in the proportion of a diminution of one thousandth part at every two miles of elevation. There are also other slight variations of gravity, from which the figure of the geoid (which see) can be calculated. Generally speaking, gravity is in excess where the radius vector of the geoid is in excess of that of the mean spheroid. [The words gravity and gravitation have been more or less confounded; but the most careful writers use gravitation for the attracting force, and gravity for the terrestrial phenomenon of weight or downward acceleration which has for its two components the gravitation and the centrifugal force. The centrifugal force at the equator is $\frac{1}{289.4}$ of gravity. It is everywhere exerted in the plane of the meridian at right angles to the direction of the celestial pole. The direction of gravitation in middle latitudes is inclined about 11′.5 to the radius of the earth.

None need a guide, by sure attraction led,
And strong impulsive gravity of head.
Pope, Dunciad, iv. 76.]

2. Solemnity of deportment or character; sedateness of demeanor; seriousness.

Great Cato there, for gravity renowned. Dryden.

When the French stage came to be reformed by Cardinal Richelieu, those long harangues were introduced to comply with the gravity of a churchman.
Dryden, Essay on Dram. Poesy.

His witticisms, and his tables of figures, constitute the only parts of his work which can be perused with perfect gravity. Macaulay, Sadler's Ref. Refuted.

We listen in public with the gravity of augurs to what we smile at when we meet a brother adept.
Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 379.

3. Importance; significance; dignity.

Length therefore is a thing which the grauitie and weight of such actions [prayer] doth require.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v.

They derive an importance from . . . the gravity of the place where they were uttered. Burke.

4. In acoustics, the state of being low in pitch: opposed to acuteness.—Acceleration of gravity. See acceleration (b).—Center of gravity. See center[1].—Gravity cell, or gravity battery, in elect. See cell, 8.—Line of direction of gravity, the line drawn through the center of gravity of a body in the direction in which gravity tends to move it; the line along which the center of gravity would begin to fall if the body were free.—Specific gravity, the ratio of the weight of a given bulk of any substance to that of a standard substance. The substance taken as the standard is water for solids and liquids, air or hydrogen for gases. The weights of bodies being proportional to their masses, it follows that the specific gravity of a body is equivalent to its relative density, and the term density has nearly displaced specific gravity in scientific works. As long as the term specific gravity was in use, water at 62° F. was taken as the standard in England; when the term density is used, water at its maximum density (4° C. or 39.2° F.) is the standard. If great accuracy is required, corrections must be made for temperature and for the buoyancy of the air. Thus, if we take equal bulks of water, silver, and platinum, and weigh them, the silver will be found to be 10.5 times and the platinum 21.4 times heavier than the water; and reckoning the specific gravity of water as unity, the specific gravity of silver is said to be 10.5, and that of platinum 21.4. A common method of obtaining the specific gravity of solids is to weigh the body in air, then in pure distilled water, and divide the weight in air by the loss of weight in water, the result being the specific gravity of the body. There are, however, numerous other ways of obtaining this relation, as by the use of the pycnometer, the hydrometer (which see), etc. See gravity-solution.

The specific gravity of a body is the ratio of its density to that of some standard substance, generally water.
Clerk Maxwell, Heat, p. 82.

Specific-gravity beads or bulbs, small hollow spheres, usually of glass, used in determining the specific gravity of a liquid. If a number of them, each having its specific gravity marked on it, be thrown into the liquid, that one which just floats gives the required specific gravity, the others either sinking or floating.—Specific-gravity bottle or flask, a pycnometer.

gravity-railroad (grav′i-ti-rāl′rōd), n. A railroad in which the cars move down an inclined plane, or a series of inclined planes, under the action of gravity alone. Such roads are often arranged so that the loaded cars in descending pull a train of empty cars up to the summit; or the empty cars may be hauled up by steam-power.

gravity-solution (grav′i-ti-sō-lū′shọn), n. A solution used by lithologists for separating from one another the different minerals of which rocks are composed, by taking advantage of their differences of specific gravity. The method is analogous to the process of ore-dressing, which is a separation of minerals differing in specific gravity in the large way, the fluid used being water. The essential difference, however, is that the fluid used by the lithologist is varied in specific gravity, by dilution, to just the desired conditions, while the water, of course, remains always the same when used by the ore-dresser. The idea of using a gravity-solution in lithological research originated with Thoulet in 1879. The fluid which he used was a solution of the iodide of mercury in iodide of potassium, having a density of 2.77 at 57° F. Borotungstate of cadmium, methyl-iodide, and fused silver nitrate, diluted with common salt, are also used. See specific gravity.

gravous†, a. [= Sp. Pg. It. gravoso, < ML. gravosus, equiv. to L. gravis, heavy, weighty, grave: see grave[3], and cf. grievous.] Weighty; important.

And farther the forsayd Lyon desired an abstinence of warre to be taken, tyll the two dukes might haue communication of grauous matters concernyng the welths of bothe these realmes. Hall, Edw. IV., an. 22.

Prudent grauous persons. Hall, Hen. VII., an. 1.

gravously†, adv. Seriously; by grave considerations.

The erle . . . grauously perswaded the magistrates of the citees and tounes, and gently and familiarly vsed and tracted the vulgare people. Hall, Hen. IV., an. 1.

gravy (grā′vi), n.; pl. gravies (-viz). [Formerly (16th century) spelled greavy, greavie, etc.; ME. gravey, grave, written graue and appar. a misreading of grane, < OF. grané (often read and printed gravé), gravy, appar. < grain, something used in cookery, something spiced: see grain[1].] The fat and juices that drip from flesh in cooking; also, these juices made into a dressing for the meat when served.

There are now at fire
Two brests of goat: both which, let Law set downe . . .
With all their fat and greauie.
Chapman, Odyssey, xviii.

To stew in one's own gravy†, to be bathed in sweat. Compare to fry in one's own grease, under grease.

He relieved us out of our purgatory [a bath], and carried us to our dressing rooms, which gave us much refreshment after we had been stewing in our own gravy.
London Spy (1709), ix. 219.

gravy-boat (grā′vi-bōt), n. A small deep dish for holding gravy or sauce, especially such a dish with a handle at one end and a long spout at the other, the whole vessel having an unsymmetrical shape; hence, by extension, any vessel for holding gravy or sauce.

★gray, grey (grā), a. and n. [I. a. < ME. gray, grey, grei, greg, etc., < AS. grǣg = OFries. grē = D. graauw = MLG. grawe, grau, LG. grau = OHG. grāo, MHG. grā (grāw-), G. grau = Icel. grār = Sw. grå = Dan. graa, gray. Not connected with G. greis, a., gray (with age), greis, n., an old man (see grise[4], grizzle[1]), nor with Gr. γραῖος, old, nor with γραῖα, an old woman. II. n. < ME. gray, grey, etc., miniver, graye, grey, a badger; from the adj.] I. a. 1. Of a color between white and black, having little or no positive color, and only moderate luminosity; ash-colored: formerly (as by Shakspere) sometimes used for 'blue.'

Is na your hounds in my cellar Eating white meal and gray?
Lord Randal (A) (Child's Ballads, II. 26).

Yon gray lines
That fret the clouds are messengers of day.
Shak., J. C., ii. 1.

Thus sang the uncouth swain to the oaks and rills,
While the still morn went out with sandals gray.
Milton, Lycidas, l. 187.

When Life's Ash-Wednesday comes about,
And my head's gray with fires burnt out.
Lowell, To C. F. Bradford.

2. Having gray hairs; gray-headed.

"A year hence, a year hence."
"We shall both be gray."
Tennyson, The Window, x.

3. Old; mature: as, gray experience.

Who pious gathered each tradition gray
That floats your solitary wastes along.
Scott, Don Roderick, Int., st. 5.

Common gray goose. The insoluble lime-soaps are decomposed, and the lime is removed, other metallic oxids present are dissolved out, and the brown coloring matter is loosened. Also called lime-sour.—Gray squirrel, whale, wolf, etc. See the nouns.

II. n. 1. A gray color or tint; a color having little or no distinctive hue (chroma) and only moderate luminosity. If only about 5 per cent. of the light is reflected, the surface is called black; if as much as 50 per cent. is reflected, it is called white. Pure gray has a slightly bluish appearance, owing to contrast with the color of brightness which enters into the sensation produced by white light. A small admixture of red with gray light makes the modified gray called ashes of roses. A small amount of green light mixed with gray is not noticed, and if the mixture is placed in juxtaposition with pure gray, the latter looks pinkish by contrast, while the former appears of a neutral tint. A larger admixture of green will give a mouse-gray (which properly requires the green to be yellowish), a still larger amount an olive gray, and still more a sage green. The effect of the admixture of violet blue is singularly dependent upon the shade of gray; if it is quite light, the result is a lilac gray or full lilac, or may be even too purple for lilac, while if the gray is darker a French gray or slate-gray results, which needs the addition of red to give lavender gray, although the latter appears bluer than lilac gray. If yellow is mixed with gray, the result is a stone gray or drab gray, or in larger admixture a full drab. All these remarks refer to mixtures of lights, not to mixtures of pigments, the effects of which depend upon the special absorption-spectra of the pigments, and can only be ascertained by direct experiment.

Thou must be stript out of thy stately garments;
And as thou camest to me,
In homely gray, instead of silk and purest pall,
Now all thy cloathing must be.
Patient Grissel (Child's Ballads, IV. 212).

No tree in all the grove but has its charms,
Though each its hue peculiar; paler some,
And of a wannish gray; the willow such.
Cowper, Task, i. 309.

2. An animal of a gray color. Specifically—(a) A badger.

The Furres and Fethers which come to Colmogro, as Sables, Beauers, Minkes, Armine, Lettis, Graies, Woolueringes, and White Foxes. Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 257.

'Twas not thy sport to chase a silly hare, Stagge, buck, foxe, wild-cat, or the limping gray.
R. Markham, in Cens. Lit., IX. 257.

(b) A gray horse.

Her mother trundled to the gate
Behind the dappled grays.
Tennyson, Talking Oak.

(c) The gray duck, or gadwall. (d) The California gray whale; the grayback. (e) A kind of salmon, Salmo ferox.

3. Twilight: as, the gray of the morning, or of the evening.

Sims was arrested by lying and disguised policemen, . . . and was carried off in the gray of the morning, after the moon set, and before the sun rose.
W. Phillips, Speeches, p. 60.

4. pl. [cap.] A Scottish regiment of cavalry forming the second regiment of dragoons in the British army: so called from the color of their horses. Also Scots Grays.—Aniline gray. Same as Coupier's blue. See blue.—In the gray, in steel-work, etc., finished without being brought to a polish.

Earnshaw was the first watchmaker who had sense enough to set at defiance the vulgar and ignorant prejudice for "high finish" of the non-acting surfaces, and to leave them "in the gray," as it is called.
Sir E. Beckett, Clocks and Watches, p. 323.

Mineral gray, a pale blue-gray pigment used by artists. It is obtained as a by-product in the manufacture of the genuine ultramarine from lapis lazuli.—Pearl gray. See pearl-gray.

gray, grey (grā), v. t. [< gray, grey, a.] 1. To cause to become gray; change to a gray color.

Canst thou undo a wrinkle?
Or change but the complexion of one hair?
Yet thou hast gray'd a thousand.
Shirley, Bird in a Cage, v. 1.

2. To depolish, as glass.

The glass should, in fact, not be ground at all, but only grayed: that is, have its surface removed by rubbing with fine emery powder. Lea, Photography, p. 48.

3. In photog., to give a mezzotint effect by covering the negative during the printing with a glass slightly ground or depolished on one side. Pictures thus treated are sometimes called Berlin portraits.

grayback (grā′bak), n. 1. The knot or red-breasted sandpiper, Tringa canutus.—2. The gray snipe. [Local, U. S.]—3. The common body-louse, Pediculus vestimenti.—4. The dab, a fish. [Local, Irish.]—5. The California gray whale, Rhachianectes glaucus.—6. The red-headed duck or American pochard, Fuligula americana. [Canada.]—7. The black-headed or American scaup duck, Fuligula marila nearctica. G. Trumbull, Bird Names, p. 55.—8. A Confederate soldier during the American civil war; a graycoat. [Colloq.]

gray-bear (grā′bâr), n. An arachnidan of the family Phalangiidæ; a harvestman. [U. S.]

graybeard, greybeard (grā′bērd), n. and a. I. n. 1. A man with a gray beard; an old man.

Gre. Youngling! thou canst not love so dear as I.
Tra. Graybeard! thy love doth freeze.
Shak., T. of the S., ii. 1.

2. Same as bellarmine.

There's plenty o' brandy in the greybeard that Luckie Maclearie sent doun. Scott, Waverley, lxiv.

3. The common sertularian hydroid polyp which infests oyster-beds, Sertularia argentea. When it forms patches on the shells, the oysters are said to hair up.

II. a. Having a gray beard; old.

Hold off! unhand me, gray-beard loon.
Coleridge, Ancient Mariner, i.

gray-bird (grā′bėrd), n. A kind of thrush. Grose. [Prov. Eng.]

graycoat (grā′kōt), n. One who wears a gray coat or uniform; specifically, in the United States, a soldier of the Confederate army during the civil war. [Colloq.]

grayfish (grā′fish), n. The coalfish. Also called graylord. [Scotch.]

gray-fly (grā′flī), n. The trumpet-fly, a kind of bot-fly, a species of Œstrus.

grayhead (grā′hed), n. 1. An old gray-headed man or woman.

Else Boys will in your Presence lose their Fear,
And laugh at the Gray-head they should revere.
Steele, Grief A-la-Mode, v. 1.

2. Among whalers, the old male of the sperm-whale. C. M. Scammon.

gray-hen (grā′hen), n. 1. The female of the black grouse or blackcock.

The Black Grouse, better known to the sportsman as the Black-cock, and the females the Grey-hen, is chiefly confined to North Britain.
W. W. Greener, The Gun, p. 515.

2. A kind of pear. [Prov. Eng.]—3. A large stone bottle. [Prov. Eng.]

grayhound, n. See greyhound.

graylag (grā′lag), n. [Written sometimes gray-lag goose, but prop., if a hyphen is used, gray lag-goose; the bird is also called simply gray goose, the qualifying lag referring, it seems, to the fact that in England, at the time when the name was given, this goose was not migratory, but lagged behind when the other wild species betook themselves to the north. Cf. lag, n., the last comer, dial. lagman, the last of a company of reapers, lagteeth, the grinders, the last teeth to come, etc. Certainly not from AS. lagu, lake, nor from It. lago, lake.] The common gray or wild goose of Europe, Anser cinereus or ferus; the fen-, marsh-, or stubble-goose, the wild original of the domestic goose.

Graylag (Anser cinereus).

grayle[1]†, n. See grail[1].

grayle[2]†, n. An obsolete spelling of grail[2].

grayle[3]†, n. See grail[3].

grayling (grā′ling), n. [Formerly also grailing; < ME. greyling, greling*; < gray + -ling[1].] 1. A fish of the family Salmonidæ and genus Thymallus. There are several species, intermediate between the whitefish and the trout, chiefly characterized by the greater development of the dorsal fin, which is long and contains 20 to 24 rays; this fin is also brightly party-colored. They inhabit clear cold streams of northern countries. The common grayling of Europe is Thymallus thymallus; related species are the American or Alaskan grayling, T. signifer, and the Michigan grayling, T. tricolor.

Alaskan Grayling (Thymallus signifer). (From Report of U. S. Fish Commission, 1884.)

And in this riuer be vmbers, otherwise called grailings.
Holinshed, Descrip. of Britaine, xiv.

The grayling haunts clear and rapid streams, and particularly such as flow through mountainous countries.
Pennant, Brit. Zoöl., The Grayling.

And here and there a lusty trout,
And here and there a grayling.
Tennyson, The Brook.

2. The dace. [Local, Eng. (Cheshire).]—3. A common European butterfly, Hipparchia semele: so called from the gray under side of the wings. [Eng.]

graylord (grā′lôrd), n. Same as grayfish. [Local, Eng. and Scotch.]

grayly, greyly (grā′li), adv. [= G. graulich = Dan. graalig; as gray, grey, + -ly[2].] With a gray hue or tinge.

Miss Lois returned, grayly pale, but quiet.
C. F. Woolson, Anne, p. 105.

graymalkin (grā-mâl′kin), n. [See grimalkin.] Same as grimalkin.

1 Witch. I come, Graymalkin!
All. Paddock calls: Anon.
Shak., Macbeth, i. 1.

graymill, gray-millet (grā′mil, -mil″et), n. [Also graymile, accom. forms, after F. grémil, of E. gromil, gromwell, q. v.] Same as gromwell.

graynard†, n. [A corrupt form of grainer[2], graner, q. v.] Same as granary.

The people, for as moche as on a tyme they lacked corne in theyr graynardes, would haue slain him with stoones.
Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, ii. 9.

grayness, greyness (grā′nes), n. [< gray, grey, + -ness.] The state or quality of being gray; prevalence of gray, as in light or the atmosphere; semi-obscurity.

Surely it was growing dark, for they sprang out like mighty light-houses upon the grayness of the void.
E. S. Phelps, Beyond the Gates, p. 71.

The view up and down the quays has the cool, neutral tone of color that one finds so often in French water-side places—the bright grayness which is the tone of French landscape art. H. James, Jr., Little Tour, p. 102.

The plain was already sunken in pearly greyness.
R. L. Stevenson, Treasure of Franchard.

graystone, greystone (grā′stōn), n. In geol., a grayish or greenish compact volcanic rock, composed of feldspar and augite or hornblende, and allied to basalt.

graywacke, greywacke (grā-wak′e), n. [Also, as G., grauwacke, < G. grauwacke, < grau, = E. gray, + wacke, q. v.] In geol., a compact aggregate of rounded or subangular grains of various silicious rocks, held together by a paste which is usually silicious. Graywacke is a slightly metamorphosed detrital rock, and is chiefly found in the Paleozoic series. When geology began to be studied as a science, the so-called "transition series" was frequently called the "Graywacke series," from the predominance in it of the rock of that name. Since the establishment of the "Silurian system" by Murchison, which (in Europe at least) consists largely of rocks formerly designated as graywacke (in German grauwacke), this term has almost entirely gone out of use.

gray-washing (grā′wosh″ing), n. In calico-bleaching, an operation following the singeing, consisting of washing in pure water in order to wet out the cloth and render it more absorbent, and also to remove some of the weavers' dressing.

gray-weather, n. See graywether.

graywether (grā′weтн″ėr), n. [< gray + wether[1]; i. e., gray ram: these stones at a distance resembling flocks of sheep. Also spelled erroneously gray-weather, with some vague thought of a 'weathered' rock. Cf. weather-head for wether-head.] One of numerous blocks of sandstone and conglomerate which are strewn over the surface of the ground in Dorsetshire and Wiltshire in England. They are supposed to be the remains of sandy Tertiary strata which once covered the districts where they now occur. It is from these blocks that Stonehenge and others of the so-called druidical circles were built; hence they have been also called druid-stones and Saracen's (more generally spelled Sarsen's) stones. See Saracen.

gray-whaler (grā′hwā″lėr), n. One who or a vessel which is employed in capturing gray whales.

graze[1] (grāz), v.; pret. and pp. grazed, ppr. grazing. [Early mod. Armor, made of metal, and lined with some soft substance, worn to protect the front of the leg below the knee. In ancient Greek examples the greaves were of thin metal fitted to the shape of the legs, which they inclosed almost completely, and were held in place by the elasticity of the metal clasping the leg. In medieval armor the greaves were often an additional defense, as of cuir-bouilli or of forged steel, worn over the chausse of mail or gamboised work. See bainberg and jambe, and first cut under armor, fig. 2. Rarely used in the singular.

The crested helm,
The plated greave and corselet hung unbrac'd.
Dyer, Ruins of Rome.

He cas'd his limbs in brass; and first around His manly legs with silver buckles bound
The clasping greaves. Pope, Iliad, xvi.

All his greaves and cuisses dash'd with drops
Of onset. Tennyson, Morte d'Arthur.

2. Boots; buskins. Wright. [Prov. Eng.]

greaves[2], n. pl. See graves[1].

grebe (grēb), n. [< F. grèbe, formerly grebe, griaibe (> G. dial. grebe), a grebe, so named, it seems, with reference to the crested species, < Bret. krib = Corn. and W. crib, a comb; cf. Bret. kriben = Corn. criban = W. cribyn, a crest, a tuft of feathers on a bird's head; W. cribell, a cock's comb.] A bird of the family Podicipedidæ (which see for technical characters); a diving bird, related to the loons or divers, but pinnatiped or lobe-footed, with a rudimentary tail, naked lores, and, in most species, a crest on the head. There are upward of 20 species, of several genera, distributed all over the world. They inhabit chiefly fresh waters, and are most expert divers and swimmers, but move on land very awkwardly, owing to the backward position of the legs. Because of the apparent absence of a tail, and the singular ruffs or crests, the aspect of these birds is peculiar. They nest in ponds, lakes, and rivers, generally building among reeds or rushes, and lay several, usually 6 or 8, elliptical whole-colored eggs. One of the best-known species is the common dabchick of Europe, Podiceps or Sylbeocyclus minor. The grebe known in America as the dabchick is Podilymbus podiceps. The largest is the spear-billed or western grebe, Æchmophorus occidentalis, peculiar to western North America. (See cut under Æchmophorus.) The great grebe is a conspicuously crested species of the old world, Podiceps cristatus. The European red-necked grebe is P. griseigena, a variety of which, P. holboelli, also inhabits North America. The Slavonian or horned grebe, P. cornutus, is common in most parts of the northern hemisphere; the eared grebe, P. auritus or nigricollis, is closely related to it. Some of the grebes reach 2 feet in length, but most of them are much smaller. The plumage of the breast is of a beautiful silvery luster and satiny texture, and is much used to ornament ladies' hats, for muffs, etc. Grebes have many local popular names, as arse-foot, dabchick, didapper, dipper, dopper, helldiver, and waterwitch.

Horned Grebe (Podiceps cornutus).

grebe-cloth (grēb′klôth), n. A cotton cloth having a hairy or downy surface on one side. Compare Canton flannel (under flannel) and swanskin.

Greco-Roman (grē″kō-rō′man), a. Of or pertaining to both Greece and Rome, as the Latin civilization after it had become modified by contact with the higher civilization of Greece, and specifically the art cultivated under Roman domination, almost exclusively by Greek artists. Greco-Roman art can be traced back as far as the fifth century B. C., but did not acquire extensive development before the Roman spoliations of Greece began in the second century. Greek sculpture at Rome retains the general characteristics of the later Hellenistic work (see Pasitelean); and Roman sculpture became most nearly a national school in its portraits and historical reliefs under the empire. Greco-Roman art is most original in its decoration, which assumes an exuberance and fantastic variety foreign to the pure Greek tradition of moderation and sobriety, while retaining much of the Greek elegance. See Pompeian. Also spelled Græco-Roman.

The Græco-Roman literature of the second century.

The true Greeks, or Hellenes, consisted only of the Dorians, Æolians, Ionians, and Achæans; but the name Greeks, in its widest sense, includes many peoples of different stock, as the Macedonians, Epirotes, Acarnanians, etc. (b) A member of the modern Greek race, which has descended, with more or less foreign admixture, from the ancient race; especially, a subject of the modern kingdom of Greece.—2. The language spoken by the inhabitants of Greece or by persons of the Greek race. Greek is a branch of the great Indo-European family of languages, being thus ultimately akin to English. Ancient Greek comprised a large number of dialects spoken in Greece proper, and on the coasts of Asia Minor and the adjacent islands, as well as in the numerous colonies of Greeks along the coast of the Mediterranean and Black seas, from Syria and Egypt to Italy, Sicily, and Spain. Of these dialects, four are usually distinguished as having received literary cultivation, namely, Ionic, Doric, Æolic, and Attic. The Old Ionic appears in the Homeric poems (hence also called Epic); the New Ionic in the histories of Herodotus. The Doric includes a number of different dialects usually characterized as "rough" or "broad," as contrasted with Attic or Ionic, namely, Dorian, Laconian, Corinthian, Megarian, Delphian, Rhodian, Cretan, Cyrenian, Syracusan, etc., literary remains being scant (Theocritus, etc.). Æolic includes Lesbian, Bœotian, Thessalian, etc., also with scant literary remains (Pindar, Alcæus, Sappho, etc.). Doric and Æolic are made to include many other dialects loosely classified under these names. The Attic, the dialect of Athens, became the standard literary tongue of Greece, and contains nearly the whole of Greek literature. In its later form, as the common dialect, it became the general language of the Greek peoples. As the common speech at Alexandria and in Palestine, it was the language in which the Old Testament became current (the Septuagint), and in which the New Testament was written. It continued, with slight changes, to be the literary language of the Greek world until the fall of the Eastern Empire; and the popular spoken form, with profound internal changes, has continued to the present day, being now the standard language of the new kingdom of Greece, and showing a strong tendency, under the fostering care of patriotic scholars and teachers, to resume the external forms of the ancient Greek. (See Romaic.) The Greek language is embodied in a literature of extraordinary variety, extent, and permanent interest, comprising works which take the first rank in nearly all the forms of literary art, and have been the accepted models of Roman and modern literature. The language is highly synthetic, having an unlimited facility of derivation and composition; and by reason of this characteristic, and of its richness in idiomatic particles and condensed forms of expression, it lends itself to all the forms of literary art. Its vocabulary is extremely copious, and has been drawn upon freely by the Latin and by modern tongues, being now, with the Latin, the accepted storehouse from which the new terms needed by modern science are generally derived. Together with Latin, the Greek language has long formed the accepted basis of a scholarly education. Modern interest in its study dates from the fifteenth century, when the Turkish inroads upon the Byzantine empire, and particularly the conquest of Constantinople in 1453, caused the permanent settlement of many Greek scholars in Italy, and hence influenced profoundly the development of the Renaissance. (See Renaissance.) Greek is divided chronologically, in the etymologies of this work, into Greek proper (Gr.), ancient or classical Greek to about the year A. D. 200; late Greek (LGr.), from that time till about A. D. 600; middle Greek (MGr.), till about A. D. 1500; and modern or new Greek (NGr.), since that date; these periods corresponding to similar periods of Latin. (See Latin.) Middle and New Greek are also called Romaic. Greek is usually printed in type imitated from the forms of letters used in the later manuscripts. The most ancient manuscripts and the inscriptions exhibit only the capital or uncial forms, without accents and without separation of words. The small letters are comparatively modern. Since it is the only language printed in this dictionary in other than Roman letters, the Greek alphabet, with the Roman equivalents, is here given:

Form.	Equivalent.	Name.	Form.	Equivalent.	Name.
Α α	a	Alpha	Ν ν	n	Nu
Β β	b	Beta	Ξ ξ	x	Xi
Γ γ	g	Gamma	Ο ο	o (short)	Omicron

II. a. Of or pertaining to Greece or the Greeks; Grecian; Hellenic.—Greek art, the art developed in ancient Greek lands, and of which the artists of Athens were the highest exponents. It was early modified by the imitation of foreign models, chiefly Oriental and Egyptian, and reached its highest perfection in the fifth century B. C. Among its salient qualities are originality, vigor, truth, wise moderation, and self-restraint, together with the ever-present love of beauty and hatred of excess, the delicacy of perception and cult of pure intelligence, characteristic of the Greek race, from which, however, a keen appreciation of the practical is never absent. The progress of Greek art can most consecutively be followed in the minor art of vase-painting. The most ancient Greek pottery, that of Hissarlik (Troy), presents no obvious Greek character. The related ware of the island of Thera, which can safely be dated as earlier than 1500 B. C., shows in its decoration the awakening of the Greek spirit, which becomes more and more accentuated, and at the same time shows the effects of foreign intercourse, in the oldest vases of other Ægean islands, of Mycenæ, Corinth, and Attica. Vase-painting was finally abandoned about 200 B. C. A few figures, from vases that can be closely dated, are given to indicate the general course and tendency of Greek art. Other illustrations, referring to all departments of this art, will be found throughout this work. See Æginetan (sculptures), archaic, Erechtheum, figurine (Tanagra), Hellenic, marbles (Elgin and Pergamene), Phidian, vases (Greek), etc. (a) Greek painting, from the fame in antiquity of such artists as Polygnotus, Zeuxis, Apelles, Parrhasius, cannot have been behind its fellow-arts; but all the originals have perished, and the materials for study include little more than the pale reflections afforded by Pompeiian and other Roman wall-paintings, by some frescoed tombs in Italy, Greece, and the Crimea, and by one or two painted sarcophagi of Etruria and of Asia Minor. (b) Greek sculpture developed comparatively late, but by the beginning of the fifth century B. C. it had gained a position on a par with that of architecture. The earliest Greek sculpture was in wood (see xoanon); all examples of it have perished. Later, this was imitated in stone (of which an Artemis of the seventh century B. C., found at Delos, is a good specimen) and in bronze, the first use of the latter material being ascribed to the artists of Chios and Samos. In the latter half of the sixth century were produced the beautiful painted archaic statues which, until they were unearthed during the last decade, remained buried on the Athenian Acropolis from the time of their entombment during the improvements which followed the Persian wars. (See archaic.) The Æginetan marbles (see Æginetan) of the beginning of the fifth century mark the last period of the archaic. The remainder of the fifth century was the period of Phidias (see ethos, 2) and the artists grouped about his name, as Myron and Polycletus. In the following century majesty and the lofty ideal gave place to a more individual and intimate quality (pathos) and to grace, of which Praxiteles was the most prominent exponent, with Scopas and others hardly less famous. The abundant and charming Greek terra-cottas throw a side light on Greek sculpture akin to that supplied by painted vases for the study of Greek painting. (c) The architecture of the Greeks was developed from a primitive framed inclosure in wood or rough stones, with a sloped roof to shed the rain. As fully developed it implies the presence of columns, both as supports and for ornament, in a system of lintel construction (see entablature), or vertical resistance to superimposed weight. The arch was known to the Greeks, but was practically never employed by them where it could be seen. The most typical production of Greek architecture is the peripteros, or temple of which the cella is entirely inclosed by ranges of columns supporting a low gabled roof. The normal plan of such buildings is rectangular, the length being slightly more than twice the breadth; but the exigencies of special use or of the nature of the site often led to wide deviations from the type, as in the Erechtheum at Athens; and circular buildings of various kinds were not uncommon. The idea of the column was probably imported from Egypt (Doric) and from Assyria (Ionic), as were many motives of decoration, as the fret, and the anthemion, which was derived in direct line, though transformed, from the lotus-blossom. (For the Greek orders, the Doric, Ionic, and Corinthian, see these words.) Greek architecture found its highest expression in stone, particularly in marble. The structures in wood have, of course, perished, and must be studied from allusions in literature and inscriptions, from certain details of stone buildings, and such remains as the terra-cotta copings of some Athenian tombs, of which the edicules in wood have disappeared, and in vase-paintings. Baked bricks are rare or not found in truly Greek work, unless possibly in prehistoric times. Much use, however, was made of unburned brick, even at a comparatively late date, and considerable remains of such work have been found at Olympia, at Eleusis, and elsewhere. The marble buildings of the period of perfection, simple and imposing in their general composition, were enriched with statuary and sculptured ornament and brilliantly colored (see polychromy in architecture, under polychromy) to bring out all their details with full effect in the clear air of the Mediterranean. Until Macedonian preponderance had vitiated the ideals of independent Greece, all this magnificence of art was reserved for the glory of the gods and the public buildings of the state. Luxury in private life was not approved, private houses being small and plain. See masonry (Greek).—Greek Church, the church of the countries formerly comprised in the Greek, Greco-Roman, or Eastern (Roman) Empire, and of countries evangelized from it, as Russia; the church, or group of local and national Oriental churches, in communion or doctrinal agreement with the Greek patriarchal see of Constantinople. It is also called the Eastern Church, in distinction from the Western, the Latin, or Roman Catholic Church. The full official title of the Greek Church is the Holy Orthodox Catholic Apostolic Oriental Church. (See Catholic, a., 3 (c).) The epithet Orthodox is that most frequently used for the Greek or Eastern Church. The estrangement between the Greek and Latin churches, culminating finally in the Great Schism, stands historically in close connection with the division of the Roman Empire into an Eastern and a Western Empire, with the growing power of the see of the new Roman capital, Constantinople or New Rome, the increasing rivalry between the see of Old Rome and that of New Rome, the insertion by the Latin Church of the filioque (see Filioque) in the Nicene Creed, the question of the ecclesiastical allegiance of the Bulgarians, and of the papal supremacy. Eastern Illyricum, including Greece, with the chief see at Thessalonica, which had belonged to the Roman patriarchate, remained with the Eastern Church. Before the ninth century there had been temporary suspensions of communion between the Roman Church and the East. The Great Schism began, however, in the latter part of the ninth century, the principal doctrinal difficulty relating to the Filioque. The immediate occasion of suspension of communion was the intrusion by the emperor Michael III., in A. D. 857, of the learned Photius into the see of Constantinople instead of Ignatius, at that time patriarch. The Roman see asserted jurisdiction in the matter as possessing supreme power, and mutual charges of false doctrine and excommunications followed; but Photius was finally acknowledged at Rome as patriarch. The final division was that between Pope Leo IX. and the patriarch Michael Cerularius, in A. D. 1054, since which time Roman Catholics regard the Greeks or Easterns as cut off from the Catholic Church; the Greeks, on the other hand, claim that they have remained faithful to the catholic creed and ancient usages. The Greek Church is the dominant form of Christianity in the kingdom of Greece, the archipelago with the opposite coast and Cyprus, in European Turkey among both Slavs and Greeks, in part of Austria and Hungary, throughout the Russian empire, and in Rumania, Bulgaria, Servia, and Montenegro. In most of these countries the church authorities are independent of the patriarch at Constantinople. It acknowledges the first seven ecumenical councils. The doctrine of the Greek and that of the Western Church with regard to the Trinity, apart from the question of the filioque and double procession, and that with regard to the person of Christ, are the same. Baptism is regularly conferred on infants with trine immersion. Confirmation follows immediately upon baptism. Communion is given in both kinds, and to infants as well as adults. The offices of bishop, priest, and deacon are regarded as the three "necessary degrees" of orders. The highest officers of the church are the four patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, and the Russian Holy Governing Synod. Honor is paid to relics as in the Roman Catholic Church. The ordinary secular clergy can marry before ordination, but their wives must have been previously single, and they cannot remarry. Only the monastic clergy are advanced to the episcopate and other offices. The liturgical language is not absolutely fixed: in Greek-speaking communities it is Greek; in Slavonic communities, not Russian, but the ancient language known as Ecclesiastical Slavonic or Old Bulgarian.—Greek cross. See cross[1].—Greek embroidery, fancy work executed by sewing upon a background pieces of colored cloth, silk, etc., and embroidering the edges of these and the background between them with chain-stitch and other ornamental stitches.—Greek fire. See fire.—Greek key-pattern, a meander.—Greek lyre. See lyre.—Greek modes. See mode.—Greek partridge. See partridge.—Greek point-lace. See lace.—Greek sculpture. See Greek art (b).—On or at the Greek calends. See calends.

S. Butler, Hudibras, II. iii. 260.

(b) Same as sage cheese (which see, under cheese[1]).—Green cloth, green table, a gaming-table; the board at which gamblers play with cards and dice: so called because usually covered with a green cloth.

The veteran calls up two Brothers of the Green Cloth competent to act as umpires; and three minutes, fraught with mortal danger, are passed in deliberately counting the cards as they lie on the cloth, and naming them slowly.
J. W. Palmer, The New and the Old, p. 183.

His [the merchant's] bales of dirty indigo are his dice, his cards come up every year instead of every ten minutes, and the sea is his green-table, . . . and yet, forsooth, a gallant man, who sits him down before the baize and challenges all comers, . . . is proscribed by your modern moral world! Thackeray, Barry Lyndon, ix.

Green crab, Carcinus mœnas. A corresponding species in the United States is C. granulatus. See cut under Carcinus.—Green crop. See crop.—Green earth. (a) A variety of glauconite. (b) Same as terre verte.—Green fish. (a) Fresh or undried fish of any kind before being cured for the market. (b) A codfish salted but not dried. [New Eng.]—Green fog, gland, goods, gram, grasshopper, grease, herring, etc. See the nouns.—Green grosbeak. Same as greenfinch, 1.—Green hides. See hide[2].—Green lake, a pigment compounded of Prussian blue with some yellow color, generally a vegetable lake.—Green land, pasture-land. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]—Green linnet. Same as greenfinch, 1.—Green man†, a wild man; a savage; one attired like a savage. See the second extract.

A dance of four swans. To them enter five green men, upon which the swans take wing.
World in the Moon, an opera (1697).

I have mentioned some of the actors formerly concerned in the pyrotechnical shows . . . distinguished by the appellation of green men; . . . men whimsically attired and disguised with droll masks, having large staves or clubs, headed with cases of crackers. . . . These green men attended the pageants, and preceded the principal persons in the procession to clear the way.
Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 484.

Green Mountain Boys, the soldiers from Vermont in the American revolution, first organized under this name by Ethan Allen in 1775.—Green Mountain State, the State of Vermont.—Green pheasant, pollack, sand, sandpiper, scrap, etc. See the nouns.—Green smalt. Same as cobalt green.—Green Sunday, Thursday. See Sunday, Thursday.—Green turtle, ultramarine, etc. See the nouns.—Green verditer. Same as green bice.—Green vitriol, iron protosulphate.—Green wines. See wine. Compare def. 2, above.—Green woodpecker. See Gecinus and woodpecker.—To have a green bonnet†. See bonnet.—To keep the bones green, to preserve one in health. [Scotch.]

Ye might aye have gotten a Sheriffdom, or a Commissary-ship, amang the lave, to keep the banes green.
Scott, St. Ronan's Well, x.

II. n. 1. The color of ordinary foliage; the color seen in the solar spectrum between wavelengths 0.511 and 0.543 micron. According to the theory generally accepted by physicists, the sensation of pure green is a simple one. This sensation cannot be excited alone in a normal eye; but the spectrum at wavelength 0.524 micron, if the light be very much reduced, probably excites the sensation with some approach to purity. It is a common error to suppose that green is a mixture of blue and yellow. This notion arises from the observation that a mixture of blue and yellow pigments generally gives a green. The reason of this is that the color of pigments not having a true metallic appearance is that of the light which they transmit; the blue pigment cuts off the yellow rays and the yellow pigment the blue rays, but certain green rays are transmitted by both. But blue and yellow lights thrown together upon the retina excite a sensation nearly that of white, which may incline slightly to green or to pink according to the tinge of the colors mixed. Green under a high illumination appears more yellowish (the sensation being affected by the color of brightness), and darkened appears more bluish; this is especially true of emerald and yellowish greens (above all, of olive greens), and hardly holds for turquoise-green. The terms and phrases below are the common names for hues of green, some of them being also names of pigments.

Attir'd in mantles all the knights were seen,
That gratify'd the view with cheerful green.
Dryden, Flower and Leaf, l. 349.

The green of last summer is sear! Lowell, A Mood.

2. A grassy plain or plat; a piece of ground covered with verdant herbage.

Generides, for to sey yow certeyn, Whom that euer he mette vppon the grene,
ffrom his sadill he wente quyte And clene.
Generydes (E. E. T. S.), l. 3010.

O'er the smooth enamell'd green.
Milton, Arcades, l. 84.

On the fire-lit green the dance begun.
Whittier, Bridal of Pennacook, iv.

3. Specifically, a piece of grass-land in a village or town, belonging to the community, being often a remnant of ancient common lands, or, as is usual in the United States, reserved by the community for ornamental purposes; a small common.

The village of Livingston lay at the junction of four streets, or what had originally been the intersection of two roads, which, widening at the centre, and having their angles trimmed off, formed an extensive common known as the Green. S. Judd, Margaret, i. 6.

The village greens which still exist in many parts of the country [England] may fairly be regarded as a remnant of old unappropriated common land.
F. Pollock, Land Laws, p. 39.

4. In golf: (a) The whole links or golf-course. (b) The putting-green, or portion of the links devoid of hazards within twenty yards of a hole.—5. pl. Fresh leaves or branches of trees or other plants; wreaths.

The fragrant greens I seek, my brows to bind.
Dryden.

In that soft season when descending showers
Call forth the greens, and wake the rising flowers.
Pope.

6. pl. The leaves and stems of young plants used in cookery or dressed for food, especially plants of the cabbage kind, spinach, etc.

Behold the naturalist who in his teens Found six new species in a dish of greens.
O. W. Holmes, A Modest Request.

7. pl. In sugar-manuf., the syrup which drains from the loaves. The last greens, after three successive crystallizations of sugar, are purified, and form the golden syrup of commerce.—Aldehyde green, a coal-tar color used in dyeing, prepared by the action of aldehyde on magenta dissolved in sulphuric acid; the blue solution thus obtained is poured into a boiling solution of sodium hyposulphite. It is applicable only to silk and wool, and is now seldom used, being replaced by other aniline greens.—Alkali green, a coal-tar color used in dyeing, derived from diphenylamine by the benzaldehyde-green process. It is applicable to wool and silk.—Anthracene green. Same as cerulein, 2.—Apple green. See apple-green.—Baryta green. Same as manganese green.—Benzaldehyde green, a coal-tar color used in dyeing, derived from dimethyl-aniline. It is the hydrochlorid of tetramethyl-diamido-triphenyl-carbinol. It appears in commerce as various salts or zinc double salts of the color-base, and is sold under a variety of names. It is applicable to cotton, wool, and silk. Also called benzal green, benzoyl green, fast green, solid green, Victoria green.—Bladder-green. Same as sap-green.—Bremen green. Same as green bice (which see, under green[1], a.).—Bronze-green, a color in imitation of antique bronze, or of the colors produced on bronze by exposure to the weather. It is produced chemically upon brass or bronze by exposing the surface, after cleaning and polishing, to the action of acids.—Brunswick green, copper oxychlorid, $Cu_4O_3Cl_2$, produced commercially by boiling a solution of copper sulphate with a small quantity of bleaching-powder. It is a light-green powder used as a pigment.—Cassel green. Same as manganese green.—Casselmann's green, a compound of copper sulphate with potassium or sodium acetate.—Chinese green, a pigment obtained from Rhamnus chlorophorus and R. utilis.—Chromium-green. Same as chrome-green.—Cobalt green, a permanent green pigment prepared by precipitating a mixture of the sulphates of zinc and cobalt with sodium carbonate and igniting the precipitate after thorough washing. Also called Rinman's green, zinc green, Saxony green, and green smalt.—Crystallized green. Same as iodine green.—Elsner's green, a pigment prepared by precipitating the coloring matter of yellow dyewood with hydrated oxid of copper. [Not in use.]—Emerald-green, highly chromatic and extraordinarily luminous green, of the color of the spectrum at wavelength 0.524 micron, or of Schweinfurt green. It recalls the emerald by its brilliancy, but not by its tint. The term emerald-green as a name of green pigments has been applied to a variety of compounds, but the one in general use, at least in the United States, is the aceto-arsenite of copper, usually known as Paris green. Also called Pannetier green, Matthieu-Plessy green, and Arnandon green.—Erlau green. Same as green bice (which see, under green[1], a.).—Ethyl green, a dye similar to benzaldehyde green, being derived from diethyl-aniline. Also called new Victoria green.—Fast green. Same as benzaldehyde green.—French green. Same as Paris green.—French Veronese green. Same as Veronese green.—Gellert's green, a color made by mixing cobalt blue with flowers of zinc.—Gentele's green, a pigment prepared by precipitating a solution of stannate of soda with a solution of sulphate of copper, forming a stannate of copper.—Glaucous green, a very bluish and whitish green, paler and less blue than turquoise-green.—Guignet's green, a pigment prepared by a particular process, consisting of chromium oxid. It is very permanent, of a deep rich green, and is used for painting, and to a limited extent in calico-printing. It is named from the inventor of the process, which has always been kept more or less secret.—Guinea green, Helvetia green. Same as acid-green.—Hooker's green, a mixture of Prussian blue and gamboge, used by artists mostly for water-color painting.—Iodine green, a coal-tar color formerly used for dyeing, consisting of the dimethyl-iodide of trimethyl-rosaniline. Also called crystallized green.—Light green. Same as acid-green.—Lincoln green, a color formerly much used in England, and dyed with peculiar excellence at Lincoln; hence, the woolen cloth so dyed, well known as the favorite wear of persons living in the woods, as huntsmen and outlaws.

> Whan they were clothed in Lyncolne grene,
> They kest away theyr graye.
> Lytell Geste of Robyn Hode (Child's Ballads, V. 117).

> Her huke of Lyncole grene,
> It had been hers I wene
> More than fourty yere.
> Skelton, Elynour Rummyng, l. 56.

Manganese green, an unstable green composed of barium manganate. [Not in use.] Also called baryta green, Cassel green, Rosenstrehl's green.—Matthieu-Plessy green. Same as emerald-green.—Methyl green, a coal-tar color used in dyeing, being the methyl chlorid compound of methyl violet. It occurs in commerce as a zinc double salt. It is applicable to cotton, wool, and silk.—Mineral greens, green lakes prepared from copper sulphate. These vary in shade, have all the properties of copper-greens, stand weather well, are little affected by light and air, and are good pigments for coarse work.—Mittler's green, a beautiful emerald-green of French manufacture, used in color-printing. It consists of chromium oxid compounded with boracic acid and water.—Mixed greens, greens made by compounding blue and yellow pigments.—Mountain-green. Same as malachite-green.—Naphthol green, a coal-tar color used in dyeing, the iron compound of nitroso-naphthol-monosulphonic acid. It is applicable to wool only.—New Victoria green. Same as ethyl green.—Olive-green, a very dark green of low chroma. The term was formerly particularly applied to a color almost a dark gray, but seems of late years to be generally restricted to very yellowish greens of very low luminosity, the chroma of which may be quite full.—Pannetier green. Same as emerald-green.—Paris green, a pigment composed of the aceto-arsenite of copper. It is a very vivid light green, and is quite permanent, but is deficient in body. Being poisonous, it is very largely used as an insecticide to kill the potato-bug and the cotton-worm. Also called emerald-green, French green, mitis-green, Schweinfurt green.—Pomona green. Same as apple-green.—Prussian green, an imperfect prussiate of iron or Prussian blue in which the yellow oxid of iron predominates, or to which has been added yellow tincture of French berries. A better variety of Prussian green is made by precipitating the prussiate of potash with cobalt nitrate.—Rinman's green. Same as cobalt green.—Rosenstrehl's green. Same as manganese green.—Saxony green. Same as cobalt green.—Scheele's green, a pigment composed of copper arsenite ($CuHAsO_3$). It differs from Paris green in that it contains no acetic acid.—Schweinfurt green. Same as Paris green.—Sea green. See sea-green.—Solid green. Same as benzaldehyde green.—Ultramarine green, a pigment artificially prepared in France and Germany, and used instead of the arsenical greens for printing upon cotton and paper.—Veronese green, a pigment consisting of hydrated chromium sesquioxid. It is a clear bluish green of great permanency. Also called viridian.—Victoria green. Same as benzaldehyde green.—Zinc green. Same as cobalt green. (Seealso acid-green, apple-green, bottle-green, chrome-green, cinnabar-green, grass-green, malachite-green, myrtle-green, oil-green, parrot-green, pea-green, sage-green, sap-green, sea-green, turquoise-green, verdiris-green.) green[1] (grēn), v. [< ME. grenen, < AS. grēnian, intr., become green, flourish, = D. groenen = MLG. gronen = OHG. gruonēn, cruanēn, MHG. gruonen, G. grünen = Icel. grōna = Dan. refl. grönr s (cf. Sw. grönska), become green; from the adj.] I. intrans. To grow or turn green; in poetical use, to become covered with verdure; be verdurous.

> When spring comes round again,
> By greening slope and singing flood.
> Whittier, Flowers in Winter.

> The sweet May flowers will deck the mound > Greened in the April rain.
> R. H. Stoddard, Silent Songs.

II. trans. To make green; give or impart a green color to; cause to become green. [Chiefly poetical.]

> And in each pleasing hue
> That greens the leaf, or through the blossom glows
> With florid light, his fairest month array'd.
> Mallett, Amyntor and Theodora.

> Great spring before > Green'd all the year. Thomson, Spring, l. 321.

> Nature . . . greens
> The swamp, where hums the dropping snipe,
> With moss and braided marish-pipe.
> Tennyson, On a Mourner.

green[2]†, n. An obsolete form of grin[2].

> A green anoth'r hath for hem ytilde.
> Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 110.

green[3] (grēn), v. i. [Sc., also grein, grien; < ME. grenen, var. of gernen, < AS. geornan, long, yearn: see yearn[1].] To yearn; long.

> There was he till, the fifthen year,
> He green'd for hame and land.
> Rosmer Hafmand (Child's Ballads, I. 256).

> Teugh Johnnie, staunch Geordie, an' Walie,
> That griens for the fishes an' loaves.
> Burns, Election Ballads, No. 2.

greenage (grē'nāj), n. [< green[1] + -age.] Greenness; greenth. [Rare.]

> The dried stalks of last year's vegetation, which . . . are wonderfully effective in toning down the dappled greenage of the living leaves.
> J. G. Wood, Out of Doors, p. 82.

★greenback (grēn'bak), n. 1. A legal-tender note of the United States: so called because the back is printed with green ink. The first issue, of $150,000,000, was authorized by a law of February 25th, 1862; the second, of the same amount, by a law of July 11th, 1862; and the third, also of $150,000,000, by a law of March 3d, 1863. By subsequent acts the amount was somewhat decreased, and an act of March 31st, 1878, had the effect of fixing the amount then current ($346,681,016) as the regular circulation.

> The government issued greenbacks not only to suppress the rebellion, but to relieve the business of the country, inasmuch as business had been in an exhausted condition a good part of the time from 1856 to 1861.
> T. W. Barnes, Thurlow Weed, p. 529.

> The issue of United States notes—greenbacks—was due to the exigencies of the war. N. A. Rev., CXLI. 202.

2. The garfish, Belone vulgaris. [Local, Eng.] —3. The American golden plover or golden-back. Also called greenhead. [Local, U. S.]—4. A humming-bird of the genus Panoplites.—5. A frog. [Anglers' slang.]—Greenback party, a political party in the United States, which originated in 1874, and demanded the suppression of banks of issue, the confinement of the currency to greenbacks, and the total or partial payment of the debt of the United States in that currency. It has sometimes assumed the name Independent party, and has sometimes joined with the Labor-Reform party to form the Greenback-Labor or National party.

Greenbacker (grēn'bak-ėr), n. [< greenback + -er[1].] A member of the Greenback party, or one who adopts its principles. [U. S.]

> The Greenbackers guide their feet by the light of experience. W. Phillips, N. A. Rev., CXXVII. 104.

> Hence faithless and fruitless promises or encouragement to Greenbackers. New Princeton Rev., V. 202.

Greenbackism (grēn'bak-izm), n. [< greenback + -ism.] The principles of the Greenback party.

> Interest in the quarrel with the South . . . is undoubtedly declining with the masses, and as it declines they are the more readily led off into other fields of activity like Greenbackism, which is really a name for a desire for changes of all sorts. The Nation, Sept. 25, 1879, p. 200.

greenbane (grēn'bān), n. A Scotch form of greenbone.

green-bass (grēn'bȧs), n. A black-bass; any species of the genus Micropterus.

green-bearded (grēn'bēr″ded), a. Affected with greening, or having green-gill: said of oysters.

greenben (grēn'ben), n. A Scotch form of greenbone.

greenbird (grēn'bėrd), n. Same as greenfinch, 1.

greenbone (grēn'bōn), n. 1. The garfish, Belone vulgaris: so called from the greenish color of its bones. [Local, Eng.]—2. The eel-pout, Zoarces viviparus: also so called from the green color of its bones. [Local, Eng.]

green-broom (grēn'bröm), n. The dyers' broom, Genista tinctoria: so called from its use in dyeing green. Also called greening-weed, green-weed. See cut under Genista.

green-chafer (grēn'chā″fėr), n. A coleopterous insect of the genus Agestrata.

green-cloth (grēn'klȯth), n. In England, formerly, the counting-house of the king's household: so called from the green cloth on the table at which the officials sat. The Board of the Green-cloth, composed of the lord steward and his subordinates, have charge of the accounts of and provisions for the household, and also perform certain legal duties. See Board of Green Cloth, under cloth.

green-cod (grēn'kod), n. 1. The coalfish. [Local, Eng.]—2. A Californian fish of the family Chiridæ, Ophiodon elongatus, sometimes attaining a length of 3 or 4 feet, and highly ranked as a food-fish. Also called cod, bastard cod, buffalo-cod, and cultus-cod. See cut under cultus-cod.

green-corn (grēn'kȯrn), n. The string of egg-capsules of some large mollusk, as a whelk, Buccinum. It is often brought up on the lines in deep-sea fishing, and is so called from some resemblance to an ear of Indian corn.

greenery (grē'nėr-i), n. [< green[1] + -ery.] 1. Pl. greeneries (-iz). A place where green plants are reared.—2. A mass of green plants or foliage; the appearance of color presented by such a mass.

> And here were forests ancient as the hills,
> Enfolding sunny spots of greenery.
> Coleridge, Kubla Khan.

> The Archery Hall, with an arcade in front, showed like a white temple against the greenery on the northern side.
> George Eliot, Daniel Deronda, x.

greeney, n. See greeny, 3.

green-eyed (grēn'īd), a. 1. Having green eyes.

> O, beware, my lord, of jealousy;
> It is the green-ey'd monster, which doth mock
> The meat it feeds on. Shak., Othello, iii. 3.

2. Figuratively, having the mental perception disturbed, as by passion, especially by jealousy; seeing all things discolored or distorted.

> How all the other passions fleet to air,
> As doubtful thoughts, and rash-embrac'd despair,
> And shudd'ring fear, and green-ey'd jealousy.
> Shak., M. of V., iii. 2.

greenfinch (grēn'finch), n. 1. A European green grosbeak, Coccothraustes or Ligurinus chloris: so called from its color. Also called green linnet, green grosbeak, greenbird, green olf, and greeny.—2. See green finch (b), under finch[1].—Indian greenfinch. Same as yellow finch (which see, under finch[1]).

★greenfish (grēn'fish), n. 1. The coalfish or pollack. [Local, Eng.]

> A Fishmonger that sells nothing but Cod, or Greenefish.
> Cotgrave.

2. A local name of the bluefish, Pomatomus saltatrix.

> In parts of Virginia and North Carolina it [the bluefish, Pomatomus saltatrix] is known as the green-fish. . . . Blue merging into green is the color.
> Stand. Nat. Hist., III. 183.

greenfly (grēn'flī), n.; pl. greenflies (-flīz). 1. A bright-green fly, Musca chloris. E. D.—2. An aphid or plant-louse of various species: so called from the color. Imp. Dict.

green-gill (grēn'gil), n. 1. Greenness of the gills of an oyster; the state of an oyster known as greening.—2. A green-gilled oyster.

green-gilled (grēn'gild), a. Having green gills, as oysters. This condition may be naturally acquired or artificially produced. It does not impair the quality of the oysters, but in the United States it materially affects their sale, in consequence of a very general prejudice. In France, where oysters with this coloration are highly prized by epicures, greening is brought about by dilution of the salt water with fresh, which induces a growth of green confervæ, upon which the oyster feeds, and thence acquires the color sought.

green-goose (grēn'gös'), n. 1. A young or midsummer goose.—2†. A cuckold. [Old slang.]—3†. A common woman. Halliwell. [Old slang.]

> In the summer his palace is full of green-geese, and in winter it swarmeth woodcocks.
> Beau. and Fl., Woman-Hater, i. 2.

greengrocer (grēn'grō'sėr), n. A retailer of vegetables.

> There is no woman but thinks that her husband, the green-grocer, could write poetry if he had given his mind to it. C. D. Warner, Backlog Studies, p. 55.

green-grown (grēn'grōn), a. Covered with verdure.

> The floor of the alley . . . is simply meant to be green-grown, which it will in a short time be with short moss.
> Dorothy Wordsworth, Memorials of Coleorton, I. 220.

★greenhead[1] (grēn'hed), n. Same as greenback, 3. G. Trumbull.

greenhead[2]†, n. [ME. grenehede; < green[1] + -head. Cf. greenhood.] Greenness; unripeness; immaturity; childishness.

> Youthe withoute grenehede [var. gref hede] or folye.
> Chaucer, Man of Law's Tale, l. 65.

green-headed† (grēn'hed″ed), a. Marked by or springing from immature experience or judgment; ignorant. Bunyan.

★greenheart (grēn'härt), n. 1. A large lauraceous tree of Guiana, Ocotea Rodiæi. Its timber is remarkably hard, and is highly valued for its strength and durability. Its bark is known in commerce as bebeeru bark, and is used as a tonic and febrifuge.—2. In Jamaica, Colubrina Colubrina, a small rhamnaceous tree.—False greenheart, the Chytralia Chytraculia (Myrtus chytraculia of Linnæus), a small myrtaceous tree of the West Indies.

greenhood† (grēn'hud), n. [< green[1] + -hood. Cf. greenhead[2].] Greenness.

greenhorn (grēn'hȯrn), n. [In allusion to a cow, deer, or other horned animal when its horns are immature. Greenhorn (ME. Greyne horn) is applied to an ox in the "Towneley Mysteries."] A raw, inexperienced person; one unacquainted with the world or with local customs, and therefore easily imposed upon.

Not such a greenhorn as that, answered the boy.
T. Hook, Gilbert Gurney.

greenhornism (grēn'hôrn-izm), n. [< greenhorn + -ism.] The character or actions of a greenhorn. [Rare.]

He execrated the greenhornism which made him feign a passion and then get caught where he meant to capture. Disraeli, Young Duke, iv. 6.

greenhouse (grēn'hous), n. 1. A building, the roof and one or more sides of which consist of glazed frames, constructed for the purpose of cultivating exotic plants which are too tender to endure the open air during the colder parts of the year. The temperature is generally kept up by means of artificial heat. It differs from a conservatory chiefly in that it is built to receive plants growing in pots and tubs, while those contained in a conservatory, in the proper use of the term, are grown in borders and beds; but in common use the latter name is applied to a greenhouse attached to a dwelling especially for the display of plants.

Who loves a garden loves a greenhouse too; . . .
There blooms exotic beauty, warm and snug,
While the winds whistle, and the snows descend.
Cowper, Task, iii. 566.

2. In ceram., a house in which green or unfired pottery is dried before being submitted to the fire of the kiln.

The [bisque] ware being finished from the hands of the potter is brought by him upon boards to the green-house, so called from its being the receptacle for ware in the "green" or unfired state. Ure, Dict., III. 614.

Greenian (grē'ni-an), a. [< Green (see def.) + -ian.] Pertaining to the English mathematician George Green (1793–1841).—Greenian function, a function of a class introduced by Green. These functions satisfy Laplace's equation and serve to represent the distribution of electricity on an ellipsoid.

greening (grē'ning), n. [Verbal n. of green[1], v.] 1. A becoming or growing green.

The tender greening
Of April meadows. Keats, Sleep and Poetry.

In it [acid nitrate] the blacks acquire the wished-for solidity, and those even which had turned green are rendered incapable of greening. Ure, Dict., IV. 71.

Specifically—2. In oyster-culture, the process of becoming or the state of being green-gilled. See green-gilled.—3. Any variety of apple of which the ripe skin has a green color. The Rhode Island greening is the most prized in the United States.

greening-weed (grē'ning-wēd), n. Same as green-broom.

greenish (grē'nish), a. [< green[1] + -ish[1].] 1. Somewhat green; having a tinge of green: as, a greenish yellow.

All lovely Daughters of the Flood thereby,
With goodly greenish locks, all loose untyde.
Spenser, Prothalamion, l. 22.

2. Somewhat raw and inexperienced.

Greenlander (grēn'lan-dėr), n. [= D. Groenlander = G. Grönländer, after Dan. Grönlænder, Sw. Grönländare, Icel. Grœnlendingar, pl., orig. the Norse settlers in Greenland, now including the native Eskimos; < Greenland, D. Groenland, G. Dan. Sw. Grönland, Icel. Grœnaland, Greenland, the 'green land': so called from the greenness of the part first visited in 982.] An inhabitant of Greenland, a large island in the arctic regions, belonging to Denmark, northeast of and nearly adjoining North America, and settled only along the west coast, the interior and east coast being covered with ice and snow.

The prehistoric nets of the Greenlanders are no evidence of an original Eskimo custom.
Amer. Anthropologist, I. 334.

Greenland falcon. See falcon.

Greenlandic (grēn-lan'dik), a. [< Greenland (see Greenlander) + -ic.] Pertaining to Greenland, to its people, or to their language.

The modern Greenlandic alphabet. Science, X. 287.

Greenlandish (grēn'lan-dish), a. [< Greenland (see Greenlander) + -ish[1].] Pertaining to Greenland.

green-laver (grēn'lā″vėr), n. A popular name for Ulva Lactuca, an edible seaweed. Also called sea-lettuce and green-sloke.

greenlet (grēn'let), n. [< green[1] + -let. Cf. vireo, of like meaning.] 1. A bird of the family Vireonidæ, small migratory insectivorous birds peculiar to America, of which the characteristic color is greenish or olive; a vireo. There are several genera and numerous species, four of them among the commonest birds of the eastern United States, and sweet songsters. The red-eyed greenlet is Vireo olivaceus; the warbling greenlet is V. gilvus; the white-eyed greenlet is V. noveboracensis; the blue-headed greenlet is V. solitarius. See Vireonidæ.

Red-eyed Greenlet (Vireo olivaceus).

2. Some other small greenish bird.

Among Bornean forms which do not seem to have made their way into the other Philippines are the two beautiful genera of greenlets. Amer. Naturalist, XXII. 144.

★greenling (grēn'ling), n. [< green[1] + -ling[1].] The coalfish or pollock. [Local, Eng.]

greenly†, a. [< green[1] + -ly[1].] Green.

And make the greenly ground a drinking cup
To sup the blood of murder'd bodies up.
Gascoigne, Jocasta, ii. 2 (cho.).

greenly (grēn'li), adv. [< green[1] + -ly[2].] 1. With a green color; newly; freshly; immaturely.—2. Unskilfully; in the manner of a green hand.

And we have done but greenly
In hugger-mugger to inter him.
Shak., Hamlet, iv. 5.

He, greenly credulous, shall withdraw thus.
B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, v. 2.

I must assist you, I reckon, for you are setting very greenly about this gear. Scott, Monastery, xxx.

greenness (grēn'nes), n. [< ME. grenenesse, grennes, grenes, < AS. grēnnes, < grēne, green: see green[1].] 1. The quality of being green in color; verdantness; also, verdure.

This country seemed very goodly and delightsome to all of vs, in regard of the greennesse and beauty thereof. Hakluyt's Voyages, III. 399.

Massive trunks of oak, veritable worlds of mossy vegetation in themselves, with tufts of green velvet nestled away in their bark, and sheets of greenness carpeting their sides. H. B. Stowe, Oldtown, p. 485.

Beneath these broad acres of rain-deepened greenness a thousand honored dead lay buried.
H. James, Jr., Pass. Pilgrim, p. 27.

2. The state of being green, in any of the derived senses.

If any art I have, or hidden skill,
May cure thee of disease or fester'd ill,
Whose grief or greenness to another's eye
May seem unpossible of remedy,
I dare yet undertake it.
Fletcher, Faithful Shepherdess, ii. 2.

This prince, while yet the errors in his nature were excused by the greenness of his youth, which took all the fault upon itself, loved a private man's wife.
Sir P. Sidney.

Captain Browne was a tall, upright, florid man, a little on the shady side of life, but carrying his age with a cheerful greenness. H. B. Stowe, Oldtown, p. 50.

greenockite (grē'nọk-īt), n. [After its discoverer, Lord Greenock, eldest son of Earl Cathcart.] Native cadmium sulphid, a rare mineral occurring in hemimorphic hexagonal crystals of a honey-yellow or orange-yellow color, and also as a pulverulent incrustation on sphalerite.

greenovite (grē'nọ-vīt), n. [So called after George Bellas Greenough, an English geologist (died about 1855).] A manganesian variety of titanite or sphene having a rose-red color, found at St. Marcel in Piedmont.

★greenroom (grēn'röm), n. [So called from having been originally painted or decorated in green.] 1. A room near the stage in a theater, to which actors retire during the intervals of their parts in the play.

The Friday came; and for the first time in my life I found myself in the greenroom of a theatre—it was literally a green room, into which light was admitted by a thing like a cucumber-frame at one end of it. It was matted, and round the walls ran a bench covered with faded green stuff, whereupon the dramatis personæ deposited themselves until called to go on the stage; a looking-glass under the sky-light, and a large bottle of water and a tumbler on the chimney-piece, completed the furniture of this classic apartment.
T. Hook, Gilbert Gurney, I. ii.

2. A room in a warehouse where new or green cloth is received from the weaving factory.—3. A room in a medical college where the faculty meet to hold examinations, etc. [Cant.]

green-rot (grēn'rot), n. A diseased condition of wood in which the tissues have acquired a characteristic verdigris-green color. It is produced by a parasitic fungus, probably Chlorosplenium æruginosum.

green-salted (grēn'sâl″ted), a. Salted down without tanning: said of hides.

★Green salted [hides] are those that have been salted and are thoroughly cured. C. T. Davis, Leather, p. 55.

greensand (grēn'sand), n. A sandstone containing grains of glauconite, which impart to it a greenish hue. There are two sets of strata in England to which this name is applied; one is above the galt, the other below it. The greensand is also a formation of importance in the United States. It is extensively mined in New Jersey for fertilizing purposes, and commonly called marl. The glauconite is a silicate of iron and potash, and this mineral forms sometimes as much as 90 per cent. of the greensand, the rest being ordinary sand.

The chambers of the Foraminifera become filled by a green silicate of iron and alumina, which penetrates into even their finest tubuli, and takes exquisite and almost indestructible casts of their interior. The calcareous matter is then dissolved away, and the casts are left, constituting a fine dark sand, which, when crushed, leaves a greenish mark, and is known as green-sand.
Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 81.

greensauce (grēn'sâs), n. 1. The field-sorrel, Rumex Acetosella.—2. Sour dock or sorrel mixed with vinegar and sugar. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

green-sea (grēn'sē'), n. A mass of water shipped on a vessel's deck, so considerable as to present a greenish appearance.

greenshank (grēn'shangk), n. The popular name of Totanus glottis, a common sandpiper of Europe, related to the redshank, yellowshank, and other totanine birds: so called from the color of its legs. Also called green-legged horseman, whistling snipe, and cinereous godwit.

Greenshank (Totanus glottis).

greensick (grēn'sik), a. Affected by or having greensickness; chlorotic.

Those greensick lovers of chalk.
Mrs. Ritchie, Book of Sibyls.

greensickness (grēn'sik″nes), n. An anemic disease of young women, giving a greenish tinge to the complexion; chlorosis.

I'd have thee rise with the sun, walk, dance, or hunt, . . .
And thou shalt not, with eating chalk or coals,
Leather and oatmeal, and such other trash,
Fall into the green-sickness.
Fletcher (and another), Elder Brother, i. 1.

green-sloke (grēn'slōk), n. Same as green-laver.

green-snake (grēn'snāk), n. One of two different kinds of grass-snakes of the United States, of a bright-green color, uniform over all the upper parts (changing to bluish in spirits), and of very slender form: (a) Liopeltis vernalis (formerly Chlorosoma or Cyclophis vernalis), with smooth scales, inhabiting the Middle and Northern States; (b) Cyclophis æstivus (formerly Leptophis æstivus), with carinate scales, inhabiting the Middle and Southern States. They are both pretty creatures and quite harmless. See cut under Cyclophis.

green-stall (grēn'stâl), n. A stall on which greens are exposed for sale.

Green's theorem. See theorem.

greenstone (grēn'stōn), n. [First used in G. ★(grünstein): so called from a tinge of green in the color.] 1. Any one of various rocks, of eruptive origin, in general older than the Tertiary, crystalline-granular in texture, and of a dark-greenish color. The essential ingredients of the rocks formerly classed under the name of greenstone are triclinic feldspar and hornblende, with which are associated various other minerals in greater or less quantity, and especially chlorite, mica, magnetite, and apatite. The name is abandoned by some lithologists, but retained by many geologists as a convenient designation for those older eruptive rocks which have undergone so much alteration that their original character is in a measure lost, and cannot be made out except with the aid of the microscope, and not always with that help. The most important of these changes seems to be that the original augite has been converted into hornblende, while a still more advanced stage of alteration is indicated by the presence of chlorite, mica, and other minerals, the predominating color of which is greenish, and to this peculiarity the rock owes its name. The name is now mainly applied as a field term to rocks derived from basalt or diabase. It is frequently the case that rocks of such origin possess the schistose texture, and they are then called greenstone schists, as in the iron districts of Michigan. Compare melaphyre and trap.

2. A very hard and close-textured stone used for putting the last edge on lancets and other delicate surgical instruments, etc.

A hone for sharpening arms, made of a greenstone mounted in gold, was found near the principal figure.
C. T. Newton, Art and Archæol., p. 379.

Cutlers' greenstone. See def. 2.—Greenstone trachyte. See propylite.

greensward (grēn'swârd), n. [= Dan. grönsværd.] Turf green with grass.

When you see men ploughing up heath-ground, or sandy ground, or greenswards, then follow the plough.
I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 185.

Dear is the forest frowning o'er his head,
And dear the velvet green-sward to his tread.
Wordsworth, Descriptive Sketches.

greenth (grēnth), n. [< green[1] + -th, as in warmth, etc.] The quality of being green, especially with growing plants; greenness; verdure. [Rare.]

I found my garden brown and bare, but these rains have recovered the greenth. Walpole, Letters, I. 304.

The mellow darkness of its conical roof . . . making an agreeable object either amidst the gleams and greenth of summer or the low-hanging clouds and snowy branches of winter. George Eliot, Daniel Deronda, xxx.

greenwax (grēn'waks), n. [ME. grene wax: the papers in such proceedings used to be sealed with green wax.] In the former English Court of Exchequer, an estreat of fine, amercement, etc., delivered for levy to a sheriff under the seal of the court impressed upon green wax.

greenweed (grēn'wēd), n. Same as greenbroom.

Yellowes and greenes are colours of small prices in this realme, by reason that Olde and Greenweed wherewith they be died be naturall here. Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 163.

greenwing (grēn'wing), n. The green-winged teal, a duck, Querquedula crecca of Europe, or Q. carolinensis of America: so called from the bright glossy-green speculum. The latter species is also locally called American, least green-winged, or red-headed teal, mud-teal, or winter teal.

greenwithe (grēn'with), n. Vanilla claviculata, a climbing orchid of the West Indies, with a long terete stem.

★greenwood (grēn'wůd), n. [< ME. grene wood, greene wode.] 1. A wood or forest when green, as in summer.

Now she must to the grenewood gang,
To pu' the nuts in grenewood hang.
Lord Dingwall (Child's Ballads, I. 288).

Merry it is in the good green wood,
When the mavis and merle are singing.
Scott, L. of the L., iv. 12.

2. Wood which has acquired a green tint under the pathological influence of fungi.

greeny (grē'ni), a. [< green[1] + -y[1].] Greenish; having a green hue.

Great, greeny, dark masses of colour — solemn feeling of the freshness and depth of nature. Ruskin.

greeny (grē'ni), n.; pl. greenies (-niz). [Dim. of green[1].] 1. A greenhorn; a simpleton. [Colloq.]

Evelyn, State of France.

grefte†, v. An obsolete form of graft[2].

gregarian (grē-gā'ri-an), a. [As gregari-ous + -an.] Of or pertaining to a herd; gregarious; specifically, belonging to the herd or common sort; ordinary. [Rare.]

The gregarian soldiers and gross of the army is well affected to him. Howell, Letters, iii. 1.

gregarianism (grē-gā'ri-an-izm), n. [< gregarian + -ism.] The practice of gathering or living in flocks or companies.

This tendency to gregarianism is nowhere more manifest. Truth, Oct. 13, 1881.

Gregarina (greg-a-rī'nä), n. [NL., < L. gregarius, gregarious, + -ina.] 1. The typical genus of the Gregarinidæ. G. gigantea, the gregarine of the lobster, attains a length of two thirds of an inch.—2. [l. c.; pl. gregarinæ (-nē).] One of the Gregarinidæ; a gregarine.

The gregarinæ have a peculiar mode of multiplication, sometimes preceded by a process which resembles conjugation. A single gregarina (or two which have become applied together) surrounds itself with a structureless cyst. The nucleus disappears, and the protoplasm breaks up . . . into small bodies, each of which acquires a spindle-shaped case, and is known as a pseudo navicella. On the bursting of the cyst these bodies are set free, and . . . the contained protoplasm escapes as a small active body like a Protamœba. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 87.

gregarine (greg'a-rin), a. and n. [< NL. gregarina.] I. a. Having the characters of a gregarina; pertaining to the Gregarinidæ.

II. n. One of the Gregarinidæ.

gregarinid (grē-gar'i-nid), n. One of the Gregarinidæ; a gregarine.

Gregarinida (greg-a-rin'i-dä), n. pl. [NL., < Gregarina + -ida.] The Gregarinidæ, in the widest sense, as a class of protozoans, divided into Monocystidea or simple-celled gregarines, and Dicystidea or septate gregarines: nearly synonymous with Sporozoa (which see). See Gregarinidæ, Gregarinidea. Also called Cytozoa.

Gregarinidæ (greg-a-rin'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Gregarina + -idæ.] A family or other major group of endoplastic protozoans, having sphe-roidal, ovoid, or elongated bodies, sometimes with a segmental constriction, and occasionally one end of the body beaked with an epimerite bearing curved horny spines. They have no pseudopodia in the adult state, the body ordinarily presenting a dense cortical layer or ectosarc, and a more fluidic inner substance or endosarc containing an endoplast, but no contractile vacuole. Changes of form are effected by a power of contractility, and the animals are nourished by absorption of nutriment already prepared in the bodies of the animals in which they are parasitic, as insects, worms, and crustaceans. Reproduction is effected, with or without conjugation, by a process of sporation in which an encysted individual becomes filled with a mass of peculiar bodies known as pseudo-navicellæ, which discharge amœbiform contents sometimes called flagellulæ or drepanidia. All Gregarinidæ are parasites, but few, as far as known, infest vertebrates. The family name applies—(1) to all gregarines; (2) especially to the septate gregarines, for which Dicystidæ is also used. Numerous genera have been proposed, but few can be considered established, as Monocystis of the single-celled division, with Gregarina proper and Hoplorhynchus of the septate division. These two divisions correspond, respectively, to Monocystidea or Haplocyta, and to Dicystidea or Septata, when the family is ranked as a class or subclass named Gregarinida or Gregarinidea.

Gregarinidea (greg″a-ri-nid′ē-ạ), n. pl. [NL., < Gregarina + -idea.] The Gregarinidæ, in the widest sense, regarded as a subclass of Sporozoa, divided into Haplocyta and Septata, or simple-celled and septate gregarines. See Gregarinida, Gregarinidæ.

gregarious (grē-gā′ri-us), a. [= F. grégaire = Sp. It. gregario, gregarious, < L. gregarius, of a flock, common, < grex (greg-), a flock, herd, drove, swarm; supposed to be redupl. from the root seen in Gr. ἀγείρειν, collect, assemble: see agora.] 1. Disposed to live in flocks or herds; inclined to gather in companies; not preferring solitude or restricted companionship: as, cattle and sheep are gregarious animals; men are naturally gregarious.

No birds of prey are gregarious.
Ray, Works of Creation, i.

Man, a gregarious creature, loves to fly
Where he the trackings of the herd can spy.
Crabbe, The Borough.

Hating the lonely crowd where we gregarious men Lead lonely lives. Lowell, Under the Willows.

2. In bot., growing in open clusters, not matted together.

gregariously (grē-gā′ri-us-li), adv. In a gregarious manner; in a herd, flock, or company.

gregariousness (grē-gā′ri-us-nes), n. The character of being gregarious, or of living in flocks or herds; disposition to herd or associate together.

Many mammals are gregarious, and gregariousness implies incipient power of combination and of mutual protection. But gregariousness differs from sociality by the absence of definitive family relationships, except during the brief and intermittent periods in which there are helpless offspring to be protected.
J. Fiske, Cosmic Philos., ii. 341.

Urquhart, tr. of Rabelais, ii. 6.

greisen (grī′sn), n. [G. greissen, cleave, split.] A rock of the granitic family, having a crystalline-granular texture, and chiefly made up of quartz and mica. Its relations to granite are such as to lead lithologists to believe that it is an altered form of that rock, in which the feldspar has been replaced by quartz, at the same time that various accessory minerals, very characteristic of the greisen, have made their appearance. These accessory minerals are topaz, fluor-spar, rutile, tourmaline, and others, and especially cassiterite (oxid of tin), which is almost invariably found associated with this rock. Greisen is a very characteristic rock of the Erzgebirge and of its tin-mines. See granite.

greit (grēt), v. i. A Scotch spelling of greet[2].

greitht, a., n., and v. An obsolete spelling of graith.

grelot (grā-lō′), n. [F., a bell.] A small globular bell; a sleigh-bell.

Wall, Senate House Ceremonies (1798), p. 121.

3. Eccles., a piece of cloth, originally a towel of fine linen, later a piece of silk or damask and often adorned with gold or silver lace, placed on the lap of a bishop, during mass or ordination, to protect his vestments from the consecrated oil. A similar vestment used by the Pope is called a subcinctorium.

gremiale (grē-mi-ā′lē), n.; pl. gremialia (-li-ạ). [ML.: see gremial.] Same as gremial, 3.

The lap-cloth, which, under the name of gremiale, is still employed in our ritual, though its use be limited to the bishop, who has it spread out over his knees while he is seated at High Mass. Rock, Church of our Fathers, i. 409.

grent, v. A variant of grin[1]. Rom. of the Rose.

grenade (grē-nād′), n. [Formerly sometimes granade (also grenado, granado, after the Sp. form); < OF. grenade, a ball of wildfire, F. grenade, a grenade, < Sp. Pg. granada = It. granata (> D. granaat = G. Dan. Sw. granat), a grenade (cf. OF. (pome) grenate, grenade, etc., F. grenade = Sp. Pg. granada, f., = It. granato, m., a pomegranate), lit. something containing grains or seeds, from the adj., Sp. Pg. granado = It. granato, < L granatus, grained, containing seeds or grains, < granum, grain, seed: see grain[1]. Cf. granate, garnet[1], granite, and pomegranate.] An explosive missile of any kind, usually smaller than a bomb or bombshell, and not discharged from a cannon, but thrown by hand or by a shovel or fork. Grenades have been made of glass, wood, bronze or gun-metal, and many other materials, even paper, and of many different forms, even cubical, a form which has the advantage that the grenades until thrown can rest securely on the edge of a rampart or a vessel's gunwale, etc.; but the more modern practice is to use cast-iron and the spherical form only. See hand-grenade.

Dined at Sr Philip Warwick's; thence to Court, where I had discourse with the King about an invention of glasse granados. Evelyn, Diary, Feb. 4, 1664.

On this answer, the French began to cast grenades into the fort, and had succeeded in producing considerable effect, when the two mortars which they used, being of wood, bursted, and wounded those who worked them.
Gayarré, Hist. Louisiana, I. 446.

Rampart-grenade, a grenade used by the defenders of a besieged place when the besieger is near the rampart. It is thrown from the parapet or rolled down the outer slope of the rampart.

grenadier (gren-a-dēr′), n. [Also formerly granadier; = D. G. Sw. grenadier = Dan. grenader, < F. grenadier, < Sp. granadero = Pg. granadeiro = It. granatiere, < Sp. granada, It. granata, a grenade: see grenade.] 1. Originally, a soldier who threw hand-grenades. Soldiers of long service and acknowledged bravery were selected for this duty. They were the foremost in assaults. At first there were only a few grenadiers in each regiment, but companies of grenadiers were formed in France in 1670, and in England a few years later. When hand-grenades went out of general use, the name was still retained for the company, the members of which were of great stature and were distinguished by a particular uniform, as for instance the high bearskin cap. In the British and French armies the grenadier company was the first of each battalion. Now the companies of a battalion or a regiment are equalized in size and other matters, and the title in the British army remains only to the regiment of Grenadier Guards.

British Grenadier of 1745, blowing his fuse to light a grenade.

We will not go like to dragoons,
Nor yet will we like grenadiers.
Billie Archie (Child's Ballads, VI. 94).

Now were brought into service a new sort of soldiers call'd Granadiers, who were dextrous in flinging hand granados, every one having a pouch full.
Evelyn, Diary, June 29, 1678.

The Sc. forms grew, grewan, and the ME. grewhound and gresehownd, appear to be accom. to the ME. Grew, Greek, Grese, Grece, Greece (cf. Sp. galgo, greyhound, lit. 'Gallic'), while the ordinary spelling and the Sc. equiv. gray dog suggest a connection with the color gray; but the real origin of the first element is unknown. Cf. Gael. Ir. grech, a hound.] 1. A tall, very slender, fleet dog, kept for the chase, remarkable for the symmetrical strength and beauty of its form, its keen sight, and its great fleetness. There are many subvarieties of the greyhound, from the Irish greyhound and Highland breed to the smooth-haired English breeds and the Italian greyhound. It is one of the oldest varieties of the dog known, being figured on Egyptian monuments. It is supposed to be the gazehound of old English writers.

Greyhoundes [var. grehoundes] he hadde as swift as fowel in flight. Chaucer, Gen. Prol. to C. T., l. 190.

Thy greyhounds are as swift
As breathed stags, ay, fleeter than the roe.
Shak., T. of the S., Ind., ii.

2. Figuratively, a fast-sailing ship, especially an ocean passenger-steamship.

They [ships] are built in the strongest possible manner for such constructions, and are so swift of foot as to have already become formidable rivals to the English greyhounds. Sci. Amer., N. S., LVI. 2.

Grias (grī′as), n. [NL.] A lecythidaceous genus of four species, tall trees, natives of tropical America. The fruit of G. cauliflora, of Jamaica, known as the anchovy-pear, is a russet-brown drupe, which is pickled like the mango. The large glossy leaves are borne in plume-like clusters at the ends of the branches, rendering the tree very ornamental.

grond†. An obsolete preterit of grind.

grone†, v. and n. An obsolete form of groan.

Gronias (grō′ni-as), n. [NL., < Gr. γρώνη, a cavern, grot, lit. (sc. πέτρα) an eaten-out rock, fem. of γρῶνος, eaten out, < γράειν, gnaw.] A genus of catfishes, of the family Siluridæ and subfamily Ictalurinæ. G. nigrilabris, a small blind fish found in caves in the eastern United States, is the only known representative of the genus. Cope, 1864.

gronte†. An obsolete preterit of groan. Chaucer.

groom[1] (gröm), n. [Early mod. E. also groome, grome; < ME. grom, grome, a boy, youth, a serving-man, = MD. grom, a boy (Kilian), = Icel. grōmr (Jonsson), gromr (Egilsson), a man, a servant (homuncio) (not in Cleasby and Vigfusson); hence, from Teut., OF. gromme, gourme, serving-man, a groom (gourme de chambre, a groom of the chamber), > dim. gromet, > E. gromet, q. v.; ulterior origin uncertain. It is commonly supposed that groom[1], ME. grome, is the same as goom[2], ME. gome, < AS. guma, a man, with intrusive r, as in hoarse, cartridge, partridge, culprit, vagrant, etc. In bridegroom, early mod. E. bridegrome, the second element is unquestionably for earlier goom, gome, being appar. a conformation to the word groom[1]; but this does not prove the identity of the simple words. ME. gome means 'man' in an elevated sense, not implying subordination (except as it may be that of a soldier to his chief), and is chiefly, in AS. wholly, confined to poetry, while ME. grome always means 'boy,' or else 'man' as a servant or menial, and is frequent in prose as well as in poetry; moreover, the two words occur in the same piece with these differing senses. Groom is therefore to be taken as an independent word.] 1†. A boy; a youth; a young man.

Ich am nou no grom,
Ich am wel waxen. Havelok, l. 790.

She [Coveitise] maketh false pleadoures,
That with hir termes and hir domes
Doon maydens, children, and eek gromes
Her heritage to forgo. Rom. of the Rose, l. 200.

2. A boy or man in service; a personal attendant; a page; a serving-man. [Obsolete or archaic in this general sense.]

At thilke wofull day of drede,
Where every man shall take his dome,
Als well the maister as the grome.
Gower, Conf. Amant., I. 274.

I did but wait upon her like a groom.
Beau. and Fl., King and No King, v. 1.

There was not a groom about that castle
But got a gown of green.
Childe Vyet (Child's Ballads, II. 75).

Specifically—3. A boy or man who has the charge of horses; one who takes care of the horses or the stable.

Huo . . . thet mest [most] heth hors [horses], mest him fayleth gromes and stablen.
Ayenbite of Inwyt (E. E. T. S.), p. 210.

The tedious pomp that waits
On princes, when their rich retinue long
Of horses led, and grooms besmeared with gold, Dazzles the crowd. Milton, P. L., v. 356.

4. One of several officers in the English royal household: as, groom of the stole; groom of the chamber.

Make a mean gentleman a groom; a yeoman, or a poor beggar, lord president. Latimer, Sermon of the Plough.

As soon as the groom of the chambers had withdrawn.
Bulwer, My Novel, III. 335.

5. See groom[2].

groom[1] (gröm), v. t. [< groom[1], n., 3.] To tend or care for, as a horse; curry, feed, etc. (a horse): sometimes, in horse slang, used with reference to a person.

They [the steeds], . . . so long
By bandits groom'd, prick'd their light ears.
Tennyson, Geraint.

The Honourable Bob Staples daily repeats . . . his favourite original remark that she is the best-groomed woman in the whole stud. Dickens, Bleak House, xxviii.

groom[2] (gröm), n. [In this use only modern, and taken from bridegroom.] A man newly married, or about to be married; a bridegroom: the correlative of bride.

The brides are waked, their grooms are drest.
All Rhodes is summoned to the nuptial feast.
Dryden, Cym. and Iph., l. 540.

Drinking health to bride and groom,
We wish them store of happy days.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, Conclusion.

groom-grubber (gröm′grub″ėr), n. Formerly, in England, an officer of the royal household whose duty it was to see that the barrels brought into the cellar were tight and full, and to draw out the lees from casks that were nearly empty. Halliwell.

groomlet (gröm′let), n. [< groom[1] + -let.] A small groom. T. Hook. [Humorous.]

groom-porter (gröm′pōr″tėr), n. Formerly, in England, an officer of the royal household whose business was to see the king's lodging furnished with tables, chairs, stools, and firing, also to provide cards, dice, etc., and to decide disputes over games. He was allowed to keep an open gaming-table at Christmas. The office was abolished in the reign of George III. Nares.

I saw deep and prodigious gaming at the groom-porter's; vast heaps of gold squandered away in a vain and profuse manner. Evelyn, Diary, Jan. 8, 1668.

groomsman (grömz′man), n.; pl. groomsmen (-men). [< groom's, poss. of groom[2], + man.] One who acts as attendant on a bridegroom at his marriage.

Three of the stories turn on a curious idea of the sacred character of godfathers and godmothers . . . and of groomsmen and bridesmaids. N. A. Rev., CXXIII. 54.

groop (gröp), n. [Also grupe, groap, grube; < ME. grope, grupe, groupe, a trench, a drain from a cow-stall, = OFries. grōpe = D. groep, a trench, ditch, moat, = MLG. grope, a puddle, a drain from a cow-stall, = Norw. grop, a groove, cavity, hollow, = Sw. grop, a pit, ditch, hole. Cf. grip[2], a ditch, etc.] 1. A trench; a drain; particularly, a trench or hollow behind the stalls of cows or horses for receiving their dung and urine.—2. A pen for cattle. [North. Eng. and Scotch in both uses.]

[Prov. Eng.]

Robert Rutter was hurt in a groove.
Chron. Mirab., p. 81.

2. A furrow or long hollow, such as is cut by a tool; a rut or furrow, such as is formed in the ground or in a rock by the action of water; a channel, usually an elongated narrow channel, formed by any agency.

The lightning struck a large pitch-pine across the pond, making a very conspicuous and perfectly regular spiral groove from top to bottom. Thoreau, Walden, p. 144.

Specifically—3. A long and regular incision cut by a tool, or a narrow channel formed in any way (as in a part of a construction), for something (as another part) to fit into or move in.

When she gain'd her castle, upsprang the bridge,
Down rang the grate of iron thro' the groove.
Tennyson, Pelleas and Ettarre.

The clearance grooves were made with a hollow curve.
Joshua Rose, Practical Machinist, p. 94.

Especially—(a) The sunken or plowed channel on the edge of a matched board, to receive the tongue. (b) The spiral rifling of a gun. (c) In the wind-chest of an organ, one of the channels or passages into which the wind is admitted by the pallets, and with which the pipes belonging to a given key are directly or indirectly connected. When a given key is struck, its pallet is opened, and the groove filled with compressed air. Whether all the pipes connected with the groove are sounded or not depends on how many stops are drawn. Also grove.

4. In anat. and zoöl., a natural furrow or longitudinal hollow or impression, especially one which is destined to receive one of the organs in repose: as, the antennal groove; the rostral groove in the Rhynchophora, etc.— 5. Figuratively, a fixed routine; a narrow, unchanging course; a rut: as, life is apt to run in a groove; a groove of thought or of action.—Ambulacral, anterolateral, basilar, bicipital, carotid, cervical, ciliated, digastric, esophageal, hypobranchial, medullary, etc., groove. See the adjectives.

grosbeak (grōsʹbēk), n. [< gross, large, thick, + beak[1], after F. grosbec, grosbeak.] A bird having a notably large, heavy, or turgid bill: usually a general and indefinite name of birds of the family Fringillidæ: in the plural loosely synonymous with the nominal subfamily Coccothraustinæ. Among familiar examples may be noted the hawfinch or hawthorn-grosbeak, Coccothraustes vulgaris, and the greenfinch or green grosbeak, Ligurinus chloris, both of Europe. (See cut under hawfinch.) The pine-grosbeak, Pinicola enucleator, is common to both Europe and America. Peculiar to the latter country are the evening grosbeak, Hesperophona vespertina; the blue grosbeak, Guiraca cærulea; the rose-breasted grosbeak, Zamelodia (or Habia) ludoviciana the black-headed grosbeak, Z. (or H.) melanocephala; and the cardinal or scarlet grosbeak, or cardinal-bird, Cardinalis virginianus. (See cut under Cardinalis.) A few large-billed conirostral birds not of the family Fringillidæ receive the same name, as the grenadier, an African weaver-bird, and some of the thick-billed American tanagers, indicating a former very extensive use of grosbeak as an English book-name of birds of the Linnean genus Loxia in a wide sense. Less frequently written grossbeak.

He thought our cardinal grosbeak, which he called the Virginia nightingale, as fine a whistler as the nightingale herself.
The Century, XXIX. 778.

groschen (grōʹshen), n. [G., < MHG. grosche, earlier and prop. grosse, also gros, < ML. grossus, a coin so called: see gross, gros. Cf. grosset.] A small silver coin of various kinds current in Germany from the fourteenth century to the present time. Some specimens are distinguished as silbergroschen, kaisergroschen, mariengroschen. The modern groschen is worth about 2 cents.

ground-sloth (ground'slōth), n. An extinct terrestrial edentate mammal of a group represented by the megatherium and its allies, from some member of which the modern arboreal sloths are supposed to be descended; one of the family Megatheriidæ in a broad sense.

ground-sluice (ground'slōs), n. See sluice.

ground-snake (ground'snāk), n. 1. A worm-snake; any small serpent of the genus Carphophiops, a few inches long, as C. amœnus, C. vermis, or C. helenæ. [U. S.]—2. A snake of the family Coronellidæ, Coronella australis. [Australia.]

groundsop†, groundsope†, n. [Early mod. E. groundesoppe, < ME. growndesope, grundsope, < AS. grundsopa (= D. grondsop, grondsap = MHG. gruntsophe, G. grundsuppe), dregs, lees, grounds, < grund, ground, + sopa*, soppa*, sop: see ground[1] and sop, n.] Dregs; lees; grounds. Palsgrave.

ground-sparrow (ground'spar″ō), n. A ground-bird; one of several small grayish and spotted or streaked sparrows which nest on and usually keep near the ground, as the savanna-sparrow and the grass-finch, bay-winged bunting, or vesper-bird. [New Eng.]

ground-squirrel (ground'skwur″el), n. 1. A terrestrial squirrel-like rodent, as one of the genera Spermophilus and Tamias: especially applied in the United States to species of the latter genus, as Tamias striatus, the hackee or chipmunk. In the United States, where there are more kinds of ground-squirrel than in any other part of the world, those of the genus Spermophilus are mostly called gophers, by confusion with the entirely different animals of the genera Geomys and Thomomys. See chipmunk, gopher, and spermophile.

2. An African squirrel of the genus Xerus. Sclater.

ground-starling (ground'stär″ling), n. An American meadow-lark; a bird of the family Icteridæ and subfamily Sturnellinæ, as Sturnella magna or Trupialis militaris.

ground-strake (ground'strāk), n. Same as garboard-strake.

groundswell†, n. An obsolete variant of groundsel[1].

ground-swell (ground'swel), n. A broad, deep swell or rolling of the sea, occasioned by a distant storm or heavy gale, and sometimes also by distant seismic disturbances: sometimes used figuratively of a rolling surface of country, and also of a rising wave of sound or of emotion.

Groundswells are rapidly transmitted through the water, sometimes to great distances, and even in direct opposition to the wind, until they break against a shore, or gradually subside in consequence of the friction of the water. Brande and Cox.

The vessel leaned over from the damp night-breeze, and rolled with the heavy ground-swell.
R. H. Dana, Jr., Before the Mast, p. 4.

ground-table (ground'tā″bl), n. In arch., same as earth-table.

ground-tackle (ground'tak″l), n. Naut., a general term for the anchors, cables, warps, springs, etc., used for securing a vessel at anchor.

ground-thrush (ground'thrush), n. 1. A bird of the genus Cinclosoma.—2. A thrush of the genus Geocichla. No American thrushes have been placed in this genus, except by Seebohm, who refers to it the varied thrush or Oregon robin, as G. nævia; the Alaskan ground-thrush, a bird usually called Turdus nævius or Hesperocichla nævia; and a Mexican form, the Turdus pinicola of Sclater. A few of the ground-thrushes present the anomaly of 14 tail-feathers, as G. varia, forming with most authors the type of another genus, Oreocincla. Other differences among the species have also been recognized as generic, whence the names Zoöthera, Turdulus, Cichlopasser, Chamætylas, and Psophocichla, the type-species of which genera are respectively G. monticola, G. wardi, G. terrestris, G. compsonota, and G. simensis. The G. or Oreocincla varia is White's ground-thrush of Siberia, China, Japan, and southward to the Philippines; it has also been found as a straggler in Europe. Nearly related to this are G. hancii and G. horsfieldi, respectively the Formosan and the Javan ground-thrush. G. dauma, the Dauma thrush of Latham, is found in the Himalayas and southward in India; G. lunulata is South Australian; G. heinei is North Australian; G. macrorhyncha is Tasmanian; G. nilgiriensis is confined to the mountains of southwestern India; G. papuensis inhabits New Guinea; G. imbricata is Ceylonese; G. mollissima and G. dixoni are Himalayan and Indian. G. monticola, G. marginata, and G. andromedæ form a group of saw-billed ground-thrushes (Zoöthera) of the Himalayas, India, Java, etc. Among African forms are G. princei of Guinea, G. compsonota of the Gaboon (type of Chamætylas), G. bivittata of the Gold Coast, G. gurneyi and G. guttata of Natal, G. crossleyi of the Cameroons, and G. piagii of the Uganda country. The Abyssinian ground-thrush is G. simensis, which with the South African G. litsitsirupa (formerly called Turdus strepitans) represents a division of the genus called Psophocichla. The Macassar ground-thrush is G. erythronota of Celebes. G. interpres, figured by Temminck in 1828 as Turdus interpres, is supposed to be the type of Geocichla; it is found in Java, Sumatra, and Lombok. The spotted ground-thrush is G. spiloptera of Ceylon; G. peroni inhabits Timor. G. cyanotus is the white-throated ground-thrush of central and southern India. G. citrina is a bird long known as the orange-headed thrush (Latham), inhabiting the Himalayas from Nepâl to Assam, and migrating southward in India, and even to Ceylon. G. rubecula is confined to Java; G. andamensis inhabits the Andaman islands; G. albogularis, the Nicobars; G. innotata is the Malay ground-thrush; G. wardi is the pied ground-thrush of India (type of Turdulus). G. sibirica is a species known to the early writers as the white-browed thrush (Turdus sibiricus or T. auroreus), of wide distribution in Asia and neighboring islands. An isolated form is Kittlitz's ground-thrush, G. terrestris, of the Bonin islands, forming the type of the genus Cichlopasser.

3. pl. The old-world ant-thrushes; the pittas or Pittidæ.

groundwall†, n. [< ME. groundwalle, grounde-walle, grundwalle, grundwal, < AS. grundweal (= MHG. gruntwal = Sw. grundval = Dan. grundvold), a foundation, < grund, ground, + weall, wall.] A wall as foundation; a foundation.

groundways (ground'wāz), n. pl. A system of fixed timbers forming a slide, inclined downward, built upon a substantial foundation, and serving as a guide and support to the sliding ways and cradle upon which a vessel is launched. In endwise launching there is usually a pair of long groundways parallel to the length of the ship extending down some distance under water. In sidewise launching there is a large number of groundways placed transversely to the ship and extending down to the water, but usually not into it.

groundwork (ground'wėrk), n. That which forms the foundation of something; the foundation or basis; the fundamental part, principle, or motive: used of both material and immaterial things.

Behold, how tottering are your high-built stories
Of earth; whereon you trust the ground-work of your glories. Quarles, Emblems, i. 9.

The morals is the first business of the poet, as being the groundwork of his instruction. Dryden.

Treacle and sugar are the groundwork of the manufacture of all kinds of sweet-stuff: hard-bake, almond toffy, black balls, etc.
Mayhew, London Labour and the London Poor, I. 215.

★group[1] (gröp), n. [= D. groep = G. Dan. gruppe = Sw. grupp, < F. groupe, < It. gruppo, groppo, a knot, heap, group, bag (of money), = Sp. grupo, gorupo, a knot, cluster, group; prob. another form of the word which appears in F. croupe, the croup or crupper of a horse, orig. a 'bunch,' from the LG. or Scand. form of E. crop, the top of a plant, etc.: see crop and croup[2].]

1. An assemblage of persons or things; a number of persons or things gathered together with or without regular interconnection or arrangement; a cluster.

In groups they stream'd away.
Tennyson, Princess, Conclusion.

We may consider as a group those molecules which at a given instant lie within a given region of space.
H. W. Watson, Kinetic Theory of Gases, Int., p. vi.

The Arab kindred group or hayy, as we know it, was a political and social unity, so far as there was any unity in that very loosely organized state of society.
W. R. Smith, Kinship and Marriage, p. 36.

It is impossible thoroughly to grasp the meaning of any group of facts, in any department of study, until we have duly compared them with allied groups of facts.
J. Fiske, Amer. Pol. Ideas, p. 6.

2. In the fine arts, an assemblage of figures which have some relation to one another and to the general design; a combination of several figures forming a harmonious whole.

The famous group of figures which represent the two brothers binding Dirce to the horns of a mad bull.
Addison.

We would particularly draw attention to the group which was formerly thought to represent Eurytion and Deidameia, but is now identified with the group of a Centaur carrying off a virgin described by Pausanias.
C. T. Newton, Art and Archæol., p. 362.

3. In scientific classifications, a number of individual things or persons related in some definite or classificatory way.

The progress of science is the successive ascertainment of invariants, the exact quantitative determination of groups. "Every clearly defined phenomenon, every law of phenomena, is the establishment of an invariant group.
G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, II. ii. § 107.

The fact lately placed beyond all doubt by König and Dieterici, that those that are born color-blind fall naturally into two great groups, the red and green blind.
Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 311.

Specifically—(a) In zoöl., any assemblage or classificatory division of animals below the kingdom and above the species: generally said of intermediate or not regularly recognized divisions, or by way of non-committal to the exact taxonomic value of the division thus indicated. (b) In geol., a division in the geological sequence or classification of the stratified fossiliferous rocks of the highest order and deposited in an era of time.

4. In music: (a) A short rapid figure or division, especially when sung to a single syllable. (b) A section of an orchestra, comprising the instruments of the same class: as, the wood-wind group.—5. In math., a set of substitutions (or other operations) such that every product of operations of the set itself belongs to the set; a system of conjugate substitutions; a set of permutations resulting from performing all the substitutions of a conjugate system upon a series of elements; a set of functions produced by the n operations of a group of operations from n independent functions, called the fundamental system of the group. The order or degree of a group is the number of substitutions it contains; its index is this number divided into the whole number of permutations of the elements of the substitutions.—Abelian group, in math., an orthogonal group whose substitutions transform the function into itself, except for a constant factor.—Alternating group, a group of alternating numbers.—Antipotential group, in math., a group each of whose substitutions is formed from a given group of substitutions, s_1, s_2, s_3, s_4, etc., as follows: Beginning with any one of these substitutions, t, we find a cycle of substitutions s_α, s_β, s_γ, etc., such that

$$t = s_\alpha s_\beta^{-1} = s_\beta s_\gamma^{-1} =, \text{ etc.},$$

and then each of the cyclic substitutions (α, β, γ, etc.) is a substitution of the antipotential group.—Associate groups, in math., groups of associate substitutions.—Cambrian group. See Cambrian.—Chemung group, the name given by the geologists of the New York survey to certain rocks of Devonian age largely developed in Chemung county and other southern counties of New York, and further south through the Appalachian region. They are chiefly sandstones and coarse shales, and the series has a thickness of from 1,000 to 1,500 feet in New York, and a still greater in the State of Pennsylvania.—Clinton group, the name given by the New York State geologists to that part of the Upper Silurian series of rocks which lies between the Medina sandstone and the Rochester shale. The rock is chiefly an argillaceous sandstone, much of which is quite hard, and divided into layers having a peculiar wavy or knobby surface. The name is given with reference to the town of Clinton in Oneida county, New York. This group is of special interest from the occurrence in it of important deposits of iron ore. See Clinton ore, under ore.—Commutative groups, in math., two groups such that the product of two substitutions belonging to one and the other is independent of the order of the factors.—Composite group, in math., one which contains a self-conjugate subgroup other than the group itself and unity.—Congruence group of the qth degree, in math., one which consists of all substitutions $(\alpha\omega+\beta)/(\gamma\omega+\delta)$, where $\alpha\delta-\beta\gamma=1$, and where α, β, γ, δ are whole numbers, satisfying congruences to the modulus q.—Continuous group, in math.: (a) A group of substitutions infinite in number and continuously connected. (b) A group of infinitely many but discrete operations, among which infinitely small transformations occur.—Cremona group, in math., a group of Cremona substitutions.—Cretaceous group. See cretaceous.—Cyclic group, in math., a group composed of iterations of a single operation.—Dihedral group, in math., a group of rotations in three-dimensional space by which a regular polygon is brought to coincidence with its former position.—Discontinuous group, in math., a group of substitutions not continuously connected.—Double pyramid group, in math., same as dihedral group.—Exchangeable groups, in math., same as commutative groups.—Extended group, in math., a group of rotations extended by the addition of operations of perversion.—Finite group, in math., a group the number of whose substitutions is finite.—Forest-bed group. See forest.—Fuchsian group, in math., a group of linear transformations of a quantity z, by which a certain circle in the plane of imaginary quantity is transformed into itself.—Group of an equation, in math. See equation.—Group of k dimensions, in math., a group whose elements have each k indices, or are arranged in a matrix of k dimensions.—Hamilton group, in geol., a division of the Devonian series, as established by the New York geological survey. Its geological position is between the Marcellus and the Genesee shale, and it extends south and west from New York over an extensive area. Shales and flagstones are its characteristic petrographic feature, and the quarries in this formation are of value and importance.—Harlech group, in Eng. geol., the lowest division of the Primordial or Cambro-Silurian series, made up of sandstones, slates, flagging-stones, etc., developed to great thickness, and containing Olenellus, Lingulella, and other forms characteristic of the primordial fauna of Barrande.—Hudson River group, in geol., a division of the Lower Silurian series, as instituted by the New York geological survey. The rocks of this series are shales in New York, but become calcareous to the west. It is now known that the group is resolvable into units previously regarded as of earlier age and comprises rocks of Trenton-Utica and Lorraine age. The term is no longer in use as it cannot be accurately applied: it was used by some geologists as the equivalent of a group called the Cincinnati group.—Hyperfuchsian group, in math., a group of transformations in four-dimensional space by each of which a fundamental sphere is transformed into itself.—Icosahedral group, in math., the group of rotations by which an icosahedron is brought to coincide with itself; the group of 60 even permutations of 5 things.—Infinite group, in math., a group consisting of an infinity of different substitutions.—Isomorphous groups, in math.: (a) As usually understood, groups such that the operations of the first correspond each to one or several operations of the other, so that a product of operations in the one corresponds to the product of the corresponding operations in the other. (b) In Capelli's extended sense, groups which can be separated each into the same number of subgroups, so that a substitution of a subgroup in the one can be so coördinated to one of the other that products shall correspond to products.—Laramie group, in geol., a division of the Cretaceous, as developed in the Rocky Mountain region, of importance on account of its thickness and because it contains a considerable quantity of lignite: hence also called the Lignitic group. "It is allied to the Cretaceous in its dinosaurs, and to the Tertiary in its fossil plants, and is thus intermediate in its life between the Cretaceous and the Tertiary." (Dana.)—Linear group, in math., a group of substitutions each of which replaces the element $ax, y, z,$ etc., by $a\xi, \eta, \zeta,$ etc., where ξ, η, ζ are linear functions of x, y, z.—Metacyclic group, in math., a group of permutations given by advancing the element in the place c to the place $\equiv cn + k \pmod{n}$.—Octahedral group, in math., the group of 24 rotations by which the octahedron is brought back into coincidence with its position at starting; the group of 24 permutations of 4 things.—Portage group, in geol., a portion of the Devonian series, so called by the geologists of the New York survey because largely developed near Portage in that State. The Portage and Chemung groups together make up the Chemung period of Dana. The rocks of this period are chiefly sandstones and shales, and contain remains of seaweeds and of many land-plants, as well as of marine animals, especially of lamellibranchs and brachiopods.—Potential group, in math., same as antipotential group, except that

$$z^1 = \frac{az+b}{cz+d},$$

Primitive group of the nth class, in math., one in which every substitution except 1 changes n letters at least.—Quadratic group, in math., a group consisting of unity and three rotations through 180° about three several orthogonal axes.—Quaternion group, in math., a set of quaternions whose products and powers are members of the set.—Simple group, in math., one containing no self-conjugate subgroup.—Tetrahedral group, in math., the group of 12 rotations by which a tetrahedron is brought back into coincidence with its initial position; the group of even permutations of 4 things.—Transitive group, in math., a group by some substitution of which any element can be brought to any place. A group is called doubly, triply, or n times transitive if any set of 2, 3, n elements can be brought to any places.—Wenlock group, in geol., the name of a division of the Upper Silurian as developed in Wales and the adjoining counties of England. It is made up of limestones and shales, is very rich in fossil remains, especially brachiopods, gastropods, crinoids, corals, and trilobites. In geological age it is the representative of the Niagara limestone and shale of American geologists.

group[1] (grōp), v. [= D. groeperen = G. gruppen, gruppiren = Dan. gruppere = Sw. gruppera, < F. grouper, group; from the noun.] I. trans. To form into a group or into groups; arrange in a group or in groups; separate into groups: commonly with reference to the special mutual relation of the things grouped, to classification, or to some special design or purpose, as artistic effect.

> The difficulty lies in drawing and disposing, or, as the painters term it, in grouping such a multitude of different objects. Prior.

> Here the supreme art of the designer consists in disposing his ground and objects into an entire landskip; and grouping them . . . in so easy a manner that the careless observer . . . discovers no art in the combination. Bp. Hurd, Chivalry and Romance, viii.

> [They] group the party in their proper places at the altar-rails. Dickens, Dombey and Son, xxxi.

II. intrans. To fall into combination or arrangement; form a group or part of a group: used chiefly with reference to artistic effect.

> Saint Nicolas, with its great bell-tower, groups well with the smaller church and smaller tower of a neighbouring Benedictine house. E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 16.

group[2]†, n. and v. See groop.

grouper (grö′pėr), n. [Appar. an E. accom. of ★garrupa, q. v.] A serranoid fish of the genus Epinephelus or Mycteroperca. The red grouper is E. morio, of a brownish color sprinkled with gray, reddish below, the fins partly edged with blue. It is common on the southern Atlantic and Gulf coasts of the United States, attains a weight of 40 pounds, and is a good market-fish. The black grouper is E. nigritus; it shares the name jewfish with some other species. It inhabits the Gulf of Mexico and extends northward to South Carolina, and is found of 300 pounds weight. Another grouper is E.

Red Grouper (Epinephelus morio).

ascensionis, commonly called cabrilla. E. drummondhayi, of the Gulf coast, is known as hind and john-paw. Also spelled grouper.

> When taken from the water, the grouper is remarkably tenacious of life, and will live several hours.
> Quoted in Stand. Nat. Hist., III. 224.

Nassau grouper. Same as hamlet[2].

grouping (grö′ping), n. The act, process, or result of arranging in a group; relative arrangement or disposition, as of figures in a painting, persons on a stage or in a dance, incidents in a story, etc.

> Logic in its widest sense is grouping. The laws of grouping are the general tendencies of things and the general tendencies of thought.
> G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, I. i. § 66.

> Rocks, inlets, walls, and towers come out in new and varied groupings, but there is still no one prominent object. E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 225.

> We cannot safely content ourselves with fanciful grouping or imaginary drawing of character and situation.
> Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 47.

group-spring (grōp′spring), n. A spiral spring for cars formed of a nest of springs acting as one: called two-, three-, or four-group spring, according to the number in the nest.

grouse (grous), n. [Formerly also growse (18th century), grouss (1668), grows (1531); possibly a false sing., evolved (after the assumed analogy of louse, mouse, sing. of lice, mice) from the prob. older though later-appearing word grice, a grouse, appar. a particular use of grice[3], grice[4], grise[4] (also spelled gryce), gray, after OF. "poule griesche, a moorehenne, the henne of the Grice [griece, ed. 1673] or mooregame" (Cotgrave); cf. OF. "griesche, gray, as a stare; perdrix griesche, the ordinary or gray partridge, pie griesche, the wariangle (a ravenous bird)" (Cotgrave), F. pie-grièche, a shrike. The OF. griesche, gray, is appar. a var. (fem.) of gris, fem. grise (ML. griseus), gray: see grise[4].] 1. The Scotch ptarmigan, moorhen, or red-game, Tetrao or Lagopus scoticus, a British gallinaceous bird with feathered feet. It is a local modification or insular race of the common ptarmigan of Europe. Hence—2. Some bird like the above; any bird of the family Tetraonidæ and subfamily Tetraoninæ. These birds all have the feet and nasal fossæ more or less completely feathered, being thus distinguished from pheasants, partridges, quails, etc. There are numerous species, of several genera, all confined to the northern hemisphere. The largest is the European wood-grouse or cock-of-the-woods, Tetrao urogallus. (See capercaillie.) The next in size is the American sage-grouse or cock-of-the-plains, Centrocercus urophasianus. The black grouse is Lyrurus tetrix of Europe. The ruffed grouse are several species of Bonasa, as the European hazel-grouse, B. betulina, and the American, B. umbella. Notable American forms are the sharp-tailed grouse, Pedioecetes phasianellus, and the pinnated grouse, Cupidonia cupido; both are known as prairie-hens. The snow-grouse are sundry species of ptarmigan inhabiting boreal and alpine regions, and mostly turning pure white in winter; such are the willow-ptarmigan, Lagopus albus, the rock-ptarmigan, L. rupestris, and the Rocky Mountain ptarmigan, L. leucurus.

Scotch Ptarmigan or Grouse (Lagopus scoticus).

3. In the widest sense, as a collective plural, the grouse family, Tetraonidæ. In this sense the word includes various partridges and related birds.—Canada grouse, Canace or Dendragapus canadensis. Also called spruce-grouse, black grouse, spotted grouse, wood-grouse, wood-partridge, swamp-partridge, cedar-partridge, spruce-partridge, heath-hen, and formerly black and spotted heath-cock (Edwards, 1758). See cut under Canace.—Dusky grouse, the most common name of Canace or Dendragapus obscurus, a large dark slate-colored arboreal grouse of mountainous parts of western North America. Also called blue grouse, gray grouse, and pine-grouse. It runs into several local varieties, one of which is called Richardson's grouse or black-tailed grouse. It is the largest of the American tetraonines excepting the sage-cock, the male attaining a length of 2 feet and an extent of wings of 30 inches. It is chiefly found in the coniferous belt.—Pinnated grouse, the prairie-hen, Cupidonia cupido or Tympanuchus americanus: so called from the winglets on each side of the neck. See prairie-hen, and cut under Cupidonia.—Ruffed grouse, Bonasa umbella. Also called ruffed heath-cock (Edwards, 1758), brown, gray, or red ruffed grouse, drumming grouse or partridge, tippet-grouse, shoulder-knot grouse, birch-partridge; also simply partridge in the northern and middle portions of its range, and universally pheasant from Pennsylvania southward. See cut under Bonasa.—Sage-grouse, the sage-cock or cock-of-the-plains, Centrocercus urophasianus: so called because characteristic of the sage-brush regions of western North America. See cut under Centrocercus.—Sharp-tailed grouse, any grouse of the genus Pediœcetes.

Dusky Grouse (Canace or Dendragapus obscurus).

grouse (grous), v. i.; pret. and pp. groused, ppr. grousing. [< grouse, n.] To hunt or shoot grouse. [Rare.]

grouse-pigeon (grous′pij′ọn), n. A name of the sand-grouse or sand-pigeons of the family Pteroclidæ. Coues.

grouser (grou′sėr), n. [Origin unknown.] A temporary pile or heavy iron-shod pole driven into the bottom of a stream to hold a drilling- or dredging-boat or other floating object in position.

> To overcome the motion of the waves, and the current, they are provided with a submarine contrivance (spuds, grousers), which reaches to the bottom of the river.
> Eissler, Mod. High Explosives, p. 329.

grout[1] (grout), n. [< ME. grout, growte, growtt, ground malt, the first infusion preparatory to brewing, also a kind of ale or mead, < AS. grūt, grout (in first sense), = MD. grauwt (as in ME.) = Norw. grūt, sediment, grounds; cf. MHG. grūz, G. grauss = Sw. dial. grut, sand, gravel, grit: see grit[2]. The sense of 'meal' is not found in ME., but occurs in AS. (tr. L. pollen or pollis) and in MD., and is reflected in ML. grutum, grudum, meal, dim. gruttellum, gruellum, gruellus (> ult. E. gruel, q. v.), the same as grutum, grudum, grout for brewing. Allied to AS. gryt, grytt, pl. grytta, grytte, coarse meal, grits: see grit[1] and grout[2], n.] 1. Coarse meal; pollard; in the plural, groats; also, porridge made of such meal. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

> The groutes and peeces of the cornes remaining, by fanning in a Platter or in the wind, away the branne, they boyle 3 or 4 houres with water.
> Capt. John Smith, Works, I. 127.

> We were well received by them [some Curdeen Rushowins], and they brought us a sort of grout and sour milk.
> Pococke, Description of the East, II. i. 159.

> As for grout, it is an old Danish dish; and it is claimed as an honour to the ancient family of Leigh to carry a dish of it up at the coronation.
> W. King, Art of Cookery, Int., v.

2. Wort when first prepared, and before it has begun to ferment. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

> In Leicestershire, the liquor with malt infused for ale or beer, before it is fully boiled, is called grout, and before it is tunned up in the vessel is called wort.
> Kennett, quoted in Halliwell.

3. Lees; grounds; dregs.

> The ceilings were so fantastically clouded by smoke and dust, that old women might have told fortunes in them better than in grouts of tea. Dickens, Little Dorrit, v.

> But wherefore should we turn the grout
> In a drained cup?
> D. G. Rossetti, Dante at Verona.

4†. Mud; dirt; filth.

> The toun dykes on every syde,
> They were depe and full wyde,
> Full off grut, no man myghte swymme.
> Richard Coer de Lion, l. 4387.

grout[2] (grout), n. and a. [Not found, in this sense, in ME. or AS., being a mod. use of grout[1]; cf. grit[2], coarse sand, etc., as related to grit[1], coarse meal.] I. n. 1. A thin coarse mortar poured into the joints of masonry and brickwork.

A casing of stone outside, a foot and a half thick, also covered the rubble and grout work of Rufus.
Harper's Mag., LXIX. 437.

2. A finishing or setting coat of fine stuff for ceilings. E. H. Knight.

II. a. Made with or consisting of grout.—Grout wall, a foundation or cellar-wall formed of concrete and small stones, usually between two boards set on edge, which are removed and raised higher as the concrete hardens.

grout[2] (grout), v. t. [< grout[2], n.] To fill up or form with grout, as the joints or spaces between stones; use as grout.

If Roman, we should see here foundations of boulders bedded in concrete and tiles laid in courses, as well as ashlar facing to grouted insides.
Athenæum, Jan. 21, 1888, p. 91.

The mortar being grouted into the joints and between the two contiguous courses of front and common brick.
C. T. Davis, Bricks and Tiles, p. 51.

grout[3] (grout), v. t. [Perhaps 'root in the mud,' < grout[1], n., 4.] To bore with the snout, or dig up like a hog. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

grout[4] (grout), a. A dialectal form of great, seen in composition, as in grouthead, groutnoll.

grout-ale (grout'āl), n. An alcoholic drink in the south of England, apparently a variety of beer made from malt which is burned or roasted very brown in an iron pot, and fermented by means of the barm which first rises in the keeve.

guarana (gwä-rä′nä), n. [Tupi guaraná.] A paste prepared from the seeds of Paullinia cupana, a climbing sapindaceous shrub of Brazil, which in the form of rolls or cakes is extensively used in that country for both food and medicine (it contains caffein), and is employed especially in the preparation of a refreshing drink. Also called guarana-bread.

guarandt, n. [< OF. guarant, garant, warant, warrant: see warrant, and cf. guaranty.] Warrant; warrantor.

Your Majesty, having been the author and guarand of the Peace of Aix, . . . could with ill grace propose any thing to France beyond those terms, or something equivalent. Sir W. Temple, To the King, Nov. 30, 1674.

guaranin (gwä-rä′nin), n. [< guarana + -in^{2}.] A principle of guarana, similar to if not identical with caffein.

guarantee (gar-an-tē′), n. [< OF. garanté, pp. of guaranter, equiv. to garantir, guarantir, warrant: see warrant, v., and cf. warrantee, correlative to guarantor, after the equiv. warrantee, warrantor, which rest upon the verb warrant. In sense 3 a recent altered form of guaranty, with accompanying change of accent, in imitation of other legal terms like lessee, feoffee, etc.: see guaranty.] 1. A person to whom a guaranty is given: the correlative of guarantor.

The guarantee is entitled to receive payment, first from the debtor, and secondly from the guarantor.
Daniel, On Negotiable Instruments.

2. One who binds himself to see the stipulations or obligations of another performed; in general, one who is responsible for the performance of some act, the truth of some statement, etc.

God, the great guarantee for the peace of mankind, where laws cannot secure it. South, Sermons.

This was done while that Principality [Orange] was in the possession of the Prince of Orange, pursuant to an Article of the Treaty of Nimeguen, of which the King of England was guarantee.
Bp. Burnet, Hist. Own Times, an. 1685.

The person on whose testimony a fact is mediately reported is called the guarantee, or he on whose authority it rests, and the guarantee himself may be again either an immediate or a mediate witness.
Esser, tr. by Hamilton, Lectures on Logic, xxxiii.

3. Same as guaranty.

The English people have in their own hands a sufficient guarantee that in some points the aristocracy will conform to their wishes.
Macaulay, Utilitarian Theory of Government.

guarantee (gar-an-tē′), v. t. [Also written guaranty: see guarantee, n.] 1. To be warrant or surety for; secure as an effect or consequence; make sure or certain; warrant.

The intellectual activity of the acuter intellects, however feeble may be its immediate influence, is the great force which stimulates and guarantees every advance of the race. Leslie Stephen, Eng. Thought, i. § 17.

The aim of Descartes was, no doubt, to find absolutely ultimate truth and certainty, as guaranteed by the reflective analysis of consciousness.
Veitch, Introd. to Descartes's Method, p. lxxx.

2. In law, to bind one's self that the obligation of another shall be performed, or that something affecting the right of the person in whose favor the guaranty is made shall be done or shall occur. To guarantee a contract or an undertaking by another is to bind one's self that it shall be performed or carried out. To guarantee the collection of a debt is to bind one's self to pay it if it proves not collectible by ordinary means. To guarantee any subject of a business transaction is to make one's self legally answerable for its being exactly as represented: as, the seller guaranteed the quality of the goods; the carrier gave a bill of lading with the words "quantity guaranteed" (meaning that he stipulated to be answerable for the quantity specified, without any further question or dispute as to amount).

Public treaties made under the sanction, and some of them guaranteed by the sovereign powers of other nations.
Burke, On French Affairs

3. To undertake to secure to another, as claims, rights, or possessions; pledge one's self to uphold or maintain.

By the treaty of alliance she guaranteed the Polish constitution in a secret article. Brougham.

The possession of Navarre, which had been guaranteed to them on their father's decease. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., i. 2.

The great problem is to guarantee individualism against the masses on the one hand, and the masses against the individual on the other. G. Ripley, in Frothingham, p. 147.

4. To engage to indemnify for or protect from injury: as, to guarantee one against loss.

guarantor (gar′an-tôr), n. [< OF. garantor, garanteur, waircnteor, etc.: see warrantor, a doublet of guarantor.] One who makes a guaranty. [The following distinction between guarantor and surety may be noted: "A surety is generally a co-maker of the note, while the guarantor never is a maker, and the leading difference between the two is that the surety's promise is to meet an obligation which becomes his own immediately on the principal's failure to meet it, while the guarantor's promise is always to pay the debt of another." Daniel.] guaranty (gar′an-ti), n.; pl. guaranties (-tiz). [More correctly garanty or garranty (= D. garande = Dan. Sw. garanti); < OF. garantie, F. garantie (= Pr. garentia = Sp. garantía = Pg. garantia = It. guarentia), guaranty, warranty, fem. of garanti, pp. of garantir, F. garantir (= Pr. garentir = Sp. Pg. garantir = It. guarentire, guarantire; cf. D. garanderen = G. garantiren = Dan. garantere = Sw. garantera), warrant, < garant, guarant, warant, a warrant: see warrant, and cf. warranty, a doublet of guaranty.]

1. The act of warranting or securing; a warrant or surety.

The counsellor . . . pledged a word, till then undoubted, to that lie for which no guaranty but his could have won even a momentary credence. W. Phillips, Speeches, p. 74.

2. Specifically, in law, a separate, independent contract by which the guarantor undertakes, in writing, for a valuable consideration, to be answerable for the payment of some particular debt, or future debts, or the performance of some duty, in case of the failure of another person primarily liable to pay or perform. Colebrooke, On Collateral Securities. One may orally assume the debt of another, making himself a debtor immediately; but if the engagement is a mere guaranty of the obligation of another it must be in writing. [Guarantee is often used for guaranty, but in legal matters it is more correct to use guaranty for the name of the promise or contract of guaranty, guarantor for the maker of the guaranty, and guarantee for the person for whom the guaranty is made, and also for the act of performing the guaranty.]

The nature and soul of things takes on itself the guaranty of the fulfilment of every contract, so that honest service cannot come to loss. Emerson, Compensation.

Guaranties often extend to all the provisions of a treaty, and thus approach to the class of defensive alliances. Woolsey, Introd. to Inter. Law, § 105.

3. That which guarantees anything; a ground or basis of security: as, constitutional guaranties; his character is guaranty for his assertions; what guaranty have I that you will keep your word?—Continuing guaranty, an undertaking to be responsible for money to be advanced or goods to be sold to another from time to time in the future; a guaranty not exhausted by one transaction on the faith of it.—Guaranty society, a joint-stock society formed for giving guaranties for the carrying out of engagements between other parties, or for making good losses occasioned by defalcations, on the payment of a premium.—Treaties of guaranty, accessory stipulations, sometimes incorporated in the main instrument and sometimes appended to it, in which a third power promises to give aid to one of the treaty-making powers, in case certain specific rights—all or part of those conveyed to him in the instrument—are violated by the other party. Woolsey.

guaranty (gar′an-ti), v. t.; pret. and pp. guarantied, ppr. guarantying. [< guaranty, n. Cf. guarantee, v., and warranty, v.] Same as guarantee.

4. pl. In cricket, the pads or protectors worn on the legs to prevent injury from swiftly thrown balls.—5. Any part, appliance, or attachment designed or serving to protect or secure against harmful contact, injury, loss, or detriment of any kind. (a) That part of the hilt of a sword which protects the hand. Swords of antiquity and of the middle ages usually had the cross-guard. In the sixteenth century, when the use of steel gloves was abandoned and the sword became the chief weapon of persons not armed for war, the guard was made more elaborate by the addition of the pas d'ane. Toward the end of that century the knuckle-bow was added, some swords combining these two additions with two straight quillons of which the cross-guard is formed. (See cut under hilt.) Another guard of this epoch was the shell-guard. The basket-hilt came into use toward the close of the sixteenth century and lasted through the seventeenth. (See cut under claymore.) In the second half of the seventeenth century the guard became more simple, and consisted chiefly of a knuckle-bow, the shell of the guard when still used being reduced to a very small saucer-shaped plate surrounding the blade. The knuckle-bow guard continued in use throughout the eighteenth century in swords worn with civil costume, as well as in most of those used in war, and is still the guard of the modern sword and saber, some cavalry sabers and the like having this knuckle-guard so expanded laterally as to approach the form of the basket-hilt. (b) In a firearm, the metal bow or other device which protects the trigger. Also called trigger-guard. (c) An ornamental lace, hem, or border; hence, in the plural, such ornaments in general.

Gudermannian (gö-dėr-man'i-an), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the German mathematician Christoph Gudermann (1798–1852).—Gudermannian amplitude of any quantity. See amplitude.—Gudermannian function. See II.

II. n. A mathematical function named from Gudermann. The Gudermannian is expressed by the letters gd put before the sign of the variable, and it is defined by the equation $x = \log \tan (\frac{1}{4}\pi + \frac{1}{2}\,\mathrm{gd}\,x)$. The sine, cosine, and tangent of the Gudermannian are also sometimes called Gudermannians, or Gudermannian functions.

★gudgeon1 (guj'on), n. and a. [Also dial. goodgeon; early mod. E. also gogion; < ME. gojon, gojune, < OF. goujon, F. goujon, dial. govion, gouvion = It. gobione, < L. gobio(n-), another form of gobius, also cobius, < Gr. κωβιός, a kind of fish, a gudgeon, tench.] I. n. 1. A small European fresh-water fish, Gobio gobio, of the family Cyprinidæ. It is easily caught, and is used for bait. See cut under Gobio.

'Tis true, no turbots dignify my boards,
But gudgeons, flounders, what my Thames affords.
Pope, Imit. of Horace, II. ii. 142.

Hence—2. A person easily cheated or insnared.

This he did to draw you in, like so many gudgeons, to swallow his false arguments. Swift.

In vain at glory gudgeon Boswell snaps.
Wolcot, Bozzy and Piozzi, ii.

3†. A bait; an allurement; something used to deceive or entrap a person; a cheat; a lie.

Doo you thinke that James was so mad, as to gape for gogions; or so vngratious as to sell his truth for a peece of Ireland?
Stanihurst, in Holinshed's Hist. Ireland, an. 1583.

What fish so ever you be, you have made both mee and Philautus to swallow a gudgeon.
Lyly, Euphues, sig. K 3, b.

Sea-gudgeon, the black goby or rock-fish.

II. a. Resembling a gudgeon; foolish; stupid.

This is a bait they often throw out to such gudgeon princes as will nibble at it. Tom Brown, Works, I. 90.

gudgeon1 (guj'on), v. t. [< *gudgeon*1, n., 2, 3.] To insnare; cheat; impose on.

To be gudgeoned of the opportunities which had been given you. Scott.

gudgeon2 (guj'on), n. [< ME. gojone (of a pulley), < OF. goujon, gojon, gougeon, gougon, the pin of a pulley, the gudgeon of a wheel.] 1. The large pivot of the axis of a wheel. Halliwell.—2. In mach., that part of a horizontal shaft or axle which turns in the collar. The word formerly denoted the part revolving in immediate contact with the bearings. It is now applied only when that part is separate from and independent of the body of the shaft. The form of the gudgeon and the mode of its insertion depend upon the form and material of the shaft.

3. In ship-building: (a) One of several clamps, of iron or other metal, bolted to the stern-post of a ship or boat for the rudder to hang on. There is a hole in each of them to receive a corresponding pintle bolted on the back of the rudder, which thus turns as upon hinges. There are generally 4, 5, or 6 gudgeons on a ship's stern-post, according to her size.

The keel is his back, the planks are his ribs, the beams his bones, the pintal and gudgeons are his gristles and cartilages. Howell, Parly of Beasts, p. 9.

(b) One of the notches in the carrick-bits for receiving the metal bushes in which the spindle of a windlass traverses.—4. A metallic pin used for securing together two blocks or slabs, as of stone or marble.

gue1 (gū), n. [Cf. gig and gewgaw.] A musical instrument of the violin kind, having only two strings (of horsehair), and played like a violoncello, formerly used in Shetland.

He could play upon the gue, and upon the common violin, the melancholy and pathetic tunes peculiar to the country. Scott, Pirate, ii.

gue2† (gū), n. [< OF. gueux, a rogue.] A rogue; a vagabond; a sharper.

Diligent search was made all thereabout,
But my ingenious gue had got him out.
Honest Ghost, p. 232. (Nares.)

Gueber, Gheber (gē'bėr), n. [= F. Guèbre, < Pers. gabr, a worshiper of fire, a Parsee, an infidel. See Giaour, which represents the Turk. form of the Pers. word.] The name given by the Mohammedans to one belonging to the Persian sect of fire-worshipers, the remnant of the ancient Zoroastrians. They are now found chiefly in western India, and are called Parsees. Only a few thousands linger in Persia itself, chiefly in the provinces of Kirman and Yazd. Also spelled Guebre, Ghebre.

In general, this name of Ghebers is applied to the Zoroastrians or Parsis, whom a modern European would all but surely point to if asked to instance a modern race of Fire-worshippers. E. B. Tylor, Prim. Culture, II. 256.

guegaw†, n. An obsolete spelling of gewgaw. Minsheu.

guejarite (gā'här-īt), n. [< Guejar (see def.) + -ite[2].] A sulphid of antimony and copper, occurring in crystalline masses of a steel-gray color in the district of Guejar in Andalusia, Spain.

Guelf, Guelph (gwelf), n. [< It. Guelfo, It. form of G. Welf, a personal name, < OHG. MHG. welf, the young of dogs, and of wild animals, = AS. hwelp, E. whelp: see whelp.] A member of the papal and popular party of Italy in the middle ages, opposed to the Ghibellines, the imperial and aristocratic party. The Welfs (Guelfs) were a powerful family of Germany, so called from Welf I., in the time of Charlemagne. His descendants, several of whom bore the same name, held great possessions in Italy, through intermarriage, were at different times dukes of Bavaria, Saxony, and Carinthia, and founded the princely house of Brunswick and Hanover, to which the present royal family of England belongs. The names Welf and Waiblingen (Guelf and Ghibelline) are alleged to have been first used as war-cries at the battle of Weinsberg in 1140, fought and lost by Welf VI. against the Hohenstaufen emperor Conrad III. The contest soon ceased in Germany, but was taken up on other grounds in Italy, over which the emperors claimed supreme power; and the names continued to designate bitterly antagonistic parties there till near the end of the fifteenth century. See Ghibelline.

Guelfic, Guelphic (gwel'fik), a. [< Guelf, Guelph, + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the Guelfs.

The family of Dante had been Guelphic, and we have seen him already as a young man serving two campaigns against the other party. Lowell, Dante.

Under George IV. . . . was begun the great series of Monuments of German History, the editor of which was once wont to call himself Historiographer of the Most Serene Guelfic house.
Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 4.

Gueparda (gwē-pär'dä), n. [NL., < guepard.] A genus of dog-like cats, the type of a subfamily Guepardinæ: same as Cynælurus. J. E. Gray, 1867. See cut under chetah.

Guepardinæ (gwep-är-dī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Gueparda + -inæ.] A subfamily of Felidæ, typified by the genus Gueparda, containing the dog-like cat, the chetah or hunting-leopard of India, as its only living representative, characterized by lack of an internal lobe of the upper sectorial tooth, and non-retractile claws. Also called Cynælurinæ. T. N. Gill, 1872.

guerdon (gėr'don), n. [< ME. guerdon, guerdoun, gardone, gardwyne, etc., < OF. guerdon, guerredon, guarredon, guierdon, guirdon, werdon, etc., = Pr. guierdon = It. guidardone, guiderdone, < ML. widerdonum, a reward; an ingenious alteration, simulating L. donum, a gift, of the expected widerlonum*, < OHG. widarlōn (= AS. witherleán), a reward, < widar (= AS. wither), against, back again (see withernam), + lōn (= AS. leán), reward.] A reward; requital; recompense.

Gifene us gersoms and golde, and gardwynes many.
Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), l. 1729.

For recompence hereof I shall You well reward, and golden guerdon give.
Spenser, F. Q., VI. ix. 32.

Death, in guerdon of her wrongs,
Gives her fame which never dies.
Shak., Much Ado, v. 3.

To be a knight companion of Spain's proudest order of chivalry was the guerdon . . . which Spain's monarch promised the murderer, if he should succeed.
Motley, Dutch Republic, III. 544.

guerdon (gėr'don), v. t. [< ME. guerdonen, guerdounen, gardonen, < OF. guerdonner, guerredoner, guerdoner, werdoner, etc., = Pr. guiardoner = It. guidardonare, guiderdonare; from the noun.] To give a guerdon to; reward.

It is good to serue suche a lorde as gardonethe his seruaunt in suche wise.
Book of the Knight of La Tour Landry, p. 4.

My lord protector will, I doubt it not,
See you well guerdon'd for these good deserts.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., i. 4.

Him we gave a costly bribe
To guerdon silence. Tennyson, Princess, i.

guerdonable (gėr'don-a-bl), a. [< OF. guerrdonnable, guerredonable, < guerdonner, reward: see guerdon, v., and -able.] Worthy of guerdon or reward.

Finding it as well guerdonable, as grateful, to publish their libels. Sir G. Buck, Hist. Rich. III., p. 75.

guerdonless (gėr'don-les), a. [< ME. guerdonlesse; < guerdon + -less.] Without reward.

But love alas quyte him so his wage
With cruel daunger pleynly at the laste
That with the dethe guerdonlesse he paste.
Lydgate, Complaint of the Black Knight, l. 399.

guereza (ger'e-zä), n. [Native name.] 1. A large African monkey of the subfamily Semnopithecinæ, the Colobus guereza, one of the showiest Christian Union, Jan. 20, 1887.

2. The red-legged partridge, Perdix or Caccabis rufa. Montagu.

Guernsey blue, ear-shell, etc. See the nouns.

guerrilla, guerilla (ge-ril'ä), n. and a. [< Sp. guerrilla, a skirmishing warfare, a body of skirmishers, a predatory band, dim. of guerra = F. guerre, war: see war.] I. n. 1. War carried on by the repeated attacks of independent bands; a system of irregular warfare by means of raids and surprises. [Rarely used in English in this sense.]—2. Properly, a band of independent and generally predatory fighters in a war; now, more commonly, an individual member of such a band. The word was first brought into prominent use for the bands of peasants and shepherds who employed every means of annoying the French armies in Spain in 1808–14, often performing efficient service; and guerrillas were very active in the Carlist cause in the subsequent civil wars. In the American civil war there were numerous guerrillas along the border-lines, especially on the Confederate side.

He [Bismarck] never could hear of the exploits performed by francs-tireurs without flying into a rage, and he frequently complained that these guerrillas should have been captured instead of instantly shot down.
Lowe, Bismarck, I. 589.

II. a. Of or pertaining to guerrillas: as, a guerrilla attack; a guerrilla band.

A most valuable corps of light troops had been formed, schooled in all the wild, irregular movements of guerrilla warfare. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 3.

With what success he carries on this guerilla war after declining a general action with the main body of our argument our readers shall see.
Macaulay, Sadler's Ref. Refuted.

That we do make our entrance several ways.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., ii. 1.

Well, then, Mr. Trip, you have a pleasant sort of place here, I guess? Sheridan, School for Scandal, iii. 2.

Conspicuous at the centre of the Lake
Their safe retreat, we knew them well, I guess
That the whole valley knew them.
Wordsworth, Recluse.

[This use is common in English literature from the first appearance of the word; but it is now regarded as colloquial, and, from its frequency in the United States, it is generally supposed by Englishmen to be an "Americanism." By an easy extension guess is used for think, believe, or suppose, even where the meaning is not at all conjectural, but positive, and it is then logically superfluous, serving merely to make the assertion less abrupt: as, I guess I will go now (that is, I am going now); I guess I know what I'm about (that is, I know what I am doing). In most instances this use probably arises from a desire to avoid positive assertion, or from some feeling of hesitation or uncertainty.]=Syn. 1. Imagine, Presume, etc. See conjecture.

II. intrans. To form a conjecture; judge or conclude from incomplete or uncertain evidence: commonly with at or by.

The Text serves only to guess by; we must satisfie our selves fully out of the Authors that liv'd about those times.
Selden, Table-Talk, p. 21.

The best prophet is naturally the best guesser, and the best guesser, he that is best versed and studied in the matter he guesses at; for he hath most signs to guess by.
Hobbes, Of Man, iii.

He is so much improved by continual writing that it is believed in a short time one may be able to read his letters, and find out his meaning without guessing.
Steele, Tatler, No. 142.

The rattling mallet with the right they lift.
Dryden, Annus Mirabilis, l. 583.

3. To use; treat. [Scotch.]

O think then Willie he was right wae,
When he saw his uncle guided [hanged] sae.
Lads of Wamphray (Child's Ballads, VI. 171).

=Syn. 1 and 2. Guide, Direct, Sway; manage, control, pilot, steer. Guide implies that the person guiding accompanies or precedes, while direct need not mean more than that he gives instructions, which may be from a distance. The figurative uses of these words are not far from the same meanings. Direct may imply that we must reflect and exercise judgment, guide that we trustingly follow where we are led; but direct also means to exercise absolute authority: as, he directed all the movements of the army by telegraph from the seat of government. Sway in this connection is used of some influence, often bad and always strong, which turns us aside from what otherwise might have been our course, and in this sense is nearly equal to bias. (See comparison under authority.) We are guided or directed by principle or reason, or by a real friend, and swayed by our passions or feelings, or by unwise or unworthy associates.

The stars will guide us back.
George Eliot, Spanish Gypsy, iv.

Who can direct when all pretend to know?
Goldsmith, Traveller, l. 64.

Take heed, lest passion sway
Thy judgment to do aught which else free will Would not admit. Milton, P. L., viii. 635.

★guide (gīd), n. [< ME. guide, guyde, gide, gyde, < OF. guid*, guis, F. guide = Pr. guida, guit = Sp. Pg. guia = It. guida, guide; from the verb.] 1. One who leads or directs another or others in a way or course; a conductor; specifically, one engaged in the business of guiding; a person familiar with a region, town, public building, etc., who is employed to lead strangers, as travelers or tourists, to or through it.

Merlin was Guyde till thei come in a grete foreste, where thei a-lighte till here mete was made redy.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 150.

Ac the wey ys so wyckede, bote ho so hadde a gyde

guillemot (gil′e-mot), n. [< F. guillemot, appar. adapted < Bret. gwelan = W. gwylan = Corn. gullan (> E. gull[1]), a gull, sea-mew (cf. W. gwylog, the guillemot, also chwilog (accom. to chwil, whirling?), the lesser guillemot, > prob. E. dial. willock, the guillemot), + OF. moette, F. mouette, a sea-mew, of Teut. origin (see mew[1]). The F. word is thus (appar.) a cumulative compound, consisting of a Celtic word, gull, explained by its Teut. synonym, mew.] A bird of the genus Uria of Brisson, or of either of the genera Uria and Lomvia of late authors; a murre. There are several species, of the subfamily Uriinæ and family Alcidæ. The common or foolish guillemot or willock, Uria troile, is a bird about 18 inches long, web-footed, 3-toed, blackish above and white below, with short wings and tail, closely resembling the razor-billed auk, Alca torda, except in the form of the bill, which is comparatively long, slender, and acute. It inhabits rocky coasts of the North Atlantic, and congregates in vast numbers to breed, laying a single large pyriform egg on the edges of rocks overhanging the sea. A variety of this species with a white ring round the eye, and a white line behind it, is known as the ringed or spectacled guillemot, and sometimes described as a different species, L. ringvia. Both have many local names, as willy, spratter, quet, scout, skuttock, skiddaw, kiddaw, tarrock, tinker, lungie or longie, murre, marrot or morrot, lamy or lavy, strany, etc., some of these being shared by the razor-billed auk. (See cut under murre.) The thick-billed or Brünnich's guillemot is Uria lomvia, closely resembling the foregoing, but with a stouter bill. Similar guillemots inhabiting the North Pacific are known as ares or arries. The birds of the restricted genus Cepphus are smaller and otherwise distinct; they are in summer blackish, with usually a white patch on the wing, and with red legs. Such are the black guillemot or sea-pigeon, C. grylle, of the North Atlantic, and sundry North Pacific representatives of the same, as C. columba and C. mandti.

guilloche (gi-lōsh′), v. t.; pret. and pp. guilloched, ppr. guilloching. [< F. guillocher, decorate with intersecting curved lines; said to be derived from the name of the inventor of this kind of ornament, one Guillot.] To decorate with intersecting curved lines, or with any pattern composed of curved lines.

guilloche (gi-lōsh′), n. [< guilloche, v.] An ornamental pattern composed of intersecting curved lines, as the usual decoration of watch-cases; in arch., an ornament in the form of two or more bands or ribbons interlacing or braided or twisted over each other so as to repeat the same figure in a continued series of spirals. The term is applied, but improperly, to a fret.

Ionic Guilloche, from a column-base of the north porch of the Erechtheum, Athens.

guillochee (gil-ō-shē′), v. t. [Formerly guillechis, < F. guillochis, decoration with intersecting curved lines, < guillocher, decorate with intersecting curved lines: see guilloche, v.] To form guilloches on; decorate with guilloches.

A charming effect is produced at the Neuwelt houses by means of a guillocheeing machine in which an engraver's tool is drawn in regularly massed lines over the slowly revolving vase. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXIX. 349.

guillotine (gil′ō-tēn), n. [< F. guillotine: see def.] 1. A machine used in France for beheading condemned persons by the action of a heavily weighted, oblique-edged knife falling between two grooved posts upon the neck of the victim, whose head protrudes through a circular hole in a divided plank. Similar devices had been used in the middle ages. (See maiden.) The form adopted by the French government in March, 1792, was contrived, with the approval of the Assembly, by a Dr. Louis, from whom it was at first called louisette; but it afterward was named from Dr. J. I. Guillotin, who had proposed in the National Assembly in 1789 the substitution of some more humane method for the slow and cruel modes of execution then in use, but without indicating any particular machine.

2. One of several machines similar in principle to the above, much used for cutting paper, straw, etc. Also called guillotine cutter. 3. In surg., an instrument for cutting the tonsils.

guillotine (gil-ō-tēn′), v. t.; pret. and pp. guillotined, ppr. guillotining. [< guillotine, n.] To behead by the guillotine.

guillotinement (gil-ō-tēn′ment), n. [< guillotine + -ment.] Decapitation by means of the guillotine.

guills (gilz), n. [A dial. var. of goolds, for gold, n., 6.] The corn-marigold.

guilt[1] (gilt), n. [The u is a mod. and unnecessary insertion, as in the related guild; < ME. gilt, gylt, gult (where u represents the old sound of y), < AS. gylt, gielt, gilt, a fault, offense, sin, crime; orig. a payment to be made in recompense for a trespass, a debt (being used to translate L. debitum, a debt, in this sense; cf. MHG. gülte, a debt, a payment, a tax, impost, G. gülte, impost, rent, ground-rent), < AS. gildan, gieldan (pret. pl. guldon, pp. golden), pay, repay, requite: see yield, and cf. gild[2].] 1†. A fault; an offense; a guilty action; a crime.

Envye with heui herte asket af ur schrift,
And gretliche his gultus bi-ginneth to schewe.
Piers Plowman (A), v. 60.

Close pent-up guilts,
Rive your concealing continents, and cry
These dreadful summoners grace. Shak., Lear, iii. 2.

2. That state of a moral agent which results from his commission of a crime or an offense wilfully or by consent; culpability arising from conscious violation of moral or penal law, either by positive act or by neglect of known duty; criminality; wickedness.

An involuntary act, as it has no claim to merit, so neither can it induce any guilt. Blackstone, Com., IV. ii.

Who within this garden now can dwell,
Wherein guilt first upon the world befell?
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, I. 406.

It is the curse and the punishment of guilt, in public even more than in private life, that one crime almost always necessitates another.
W. R. Greg, Misc. Essays, 2d ser., p. 116.

3. Technical or constructive criminality; exposure to forfeiture or other penalty.

A ship incurs guilt by the violation of a blockade.
Chancellor Kent.

guilt[1]†, v. i. [ME. gilten, gylten, < AS. gyltan, be guilty, < gylt, guilt: see guilt[1], n.] To commit offenses; act criminally.

We . . . have offendid and giltid in such a wise agenis your heighe lordschipe.
Chaucer, Tale of Melibeus. (Harl. MS.) guilt[2]†, n. and v. An obsolete spelling of gilt[1].

guiltily (gil′ti-li), adv. In a guilty manner.

guiltiness (gil′ti-nes), n. The state or quality of being guilty; criminality; wickedness: as, the guiltiness of a purpose or an act.

He thought his flight rather to proceed of a fearful guiltiness than of an humble faithfulness. Sir P. Sidney.

guiltless (gilt′les), a. [< ME. giltles, gilteles, gyltles, gultles; < guilt + -less.] 1. Free from guilt; innocent; blameless.

And Pylate . . . toke water and waschide his hondis bifore the puple & seide I am giltles of the blood of this rightful man. Wyclif, Mat. xxvii. 24.

I have done with being judged,
I stand here guiltless in thought, word, and deed.
Browning, Ring and Book, I. 322.

2. Free from the presence or experience (of); in a humorous sense, not subject to the imputation (of).

Heifers guiltless of the yoke. Pope, Iliad.

I turned out of a small square, in front of the hotel, and walked up a narrow, sloping street, paved with big, rough stones and guiltless of a foot-way.
H. James, Jr., Little Tour, p. 76.

guiltlessly (gilt'les-li), adv. In a guiltless manner; so as to be without guilt.

guiltlessness (gilt'les-nes), n. The state or quality of being guiltless; innocence.

A good number, trusting to their number more than to their value, and valuing money higher than equity, felt that guiltlessness is not always with ease oppressed.
Sir P. Sidney.

guilt-sick (gilt'sik), a. Sickened by consciousness of guilt.

Then we live indeed,
When we can go to rest without alarm
Given every minute to a guilt-sick conscience
To keep us waking.
Beau. and Fl., Custom of the Country, iv.

guilty (gil'ti), a. [< ME. gilty, gylty, gulty, gelty, < AS. gyltig, guilty, < gylt, guilt: see guilt[1], n.] 1. Having incurred guilt; not innocent; morally or legally delinquent; culpable; specifically, having committed a crime or an offense, or having violated a law, civil or moral, by an overt act or by neglect, and by reason of that act or neglect liable to punishment.

As the Fyre began to brenne aboute hire, sche made hire Preyeres to oure Lord, that als wissely as sche was not gylty of that Synne, that he wold helpe hire.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 69.

'Tis the guilty trembles
At horrors, not the innocent.
Ford, Lady's Trial, iv. 1.

Mark'd you not
How that the guilty kindred of the queen
Look'd pale when they did hear of Clarence' death?
Shak., Rich. III., ii. 1.

2. Characterized by or constituting guilt or criminality; of a culpable character; wicked: as, a guilty deed; a guilty intent.

Nothing so good, but that through guilty shame
May be corrupt, and wrested unto ill.
Spenser, In Honour of Beautie, l. 157.

I have ta'en a due and wary note upon 't,
With whispering and most guilty diligence.
Shak., M. for M., iv. 1.

3. Pertaining or relating to guilt; indicating or expressing guilt; employed in or connected with wrong-doing.

This said, his guilty hand pluck'd up the latch,
And with his knee the door he opens wide.
Shak., Lucrece, l. 358.

She [Nature] wooes the gentle air
To hide her guilty front with innocent snow.
Milton, Nativity, l. 39.

4†. Liable; owing; liable to the penalty: with of.

They answered and said, He is guilty of death.
Mat. xxvi. 66.

Gods of the liquid realms on which I row,
If, given by you, the laurel bind my brow, Assist to make me guilty of my vow. Dryden.

★guinea (gin'ē), n. [In def. 1 (and 2), formerly guinny: so called because first coined of gold brought from Guinea on the west coast of Africa. The name of the district (formerly also written Ginny, Ginnie; Sp. Pg. Guiné, F. Guinée) appears to have been derived through the Portuguese in the 14th century from some African local name.] 1. An English gold coin, of the value of 21 shillings, first issued by Charles II. in 1663, and by his successors till 1813, since which year it has not been coined. Five-guinea pieces, two-guinea pieces, half- and quarter-guinea pieces have also been current gold coins in England.

Obverse. Reverse.
Guinea of Charles II., 1663; British Museum. (Size of the original.)

In the arrangement of coins I proposed, I ought to have inserted a gold coin of five dollars, which, being within two shillings of the value of a guinea, would be very convenient. Jefferson, Correspondence, I. 294.

But the jingling of the guinea helps the hurt that Honour feels. Tennyson, Locksley Hall.

2. A money of account, of the value of 21 shillings, still often used in English reckonings.—3. A guinea-fowl. [Colloq.]

Guinea-cloth (gin'ē-klôth), n. A collective name of textiles of different kinds made for trade with the West African coast; originally, such cloths made in India.

guinea-cock (gin'ē-kok), n. [Formerly also guinnie-cock, ginnie-cock.] The male of the guinea-fowl.

guinea-corn (gin'ē-kôrn), n. See corn[1].

guinea-dropper† (gin'ē-drop″ėr), n. One who cheats by dropping counterfeit guineas.

Who now the guinea-dropper's bait regards,
Trick'd by the sharper's dice or juggler's cards.
Gay, Trivia, iii.

guinea-edge (gin'ē-ej), n. In bookbinding, the edge of a book-cover decorated with a pattern ★like that of the edge of the old guinea coin.

guinea-fowl (gin'ē-foul), n. An African gallinaceous bird of the subfamily Numidinæ; a pintado. There are 12 or 14 species, of different genera, the best-known of which is Numida meleagris, now domesticated everywhere, and commonly called guinea-hen. It is of about the size of the common domestic hen, and has a short strong bill with a wattle hanging down at each side, the head naked and surmounted by a fleshy crest. The color of usual varieties is a dark gray, beautifully variegated with a profusion of small white spots; whence the ancient Latin and modern specific name meleagris, the spots being fancifully taken for the tears shed by the sisters of Meleager at his fate. Partial and perfect albinos also occur in domestication. The guinea-fowl was well known to the Romans, and has long been common in poultry-yards. Both flesh and eggs are esteemed as food. See Numidinæ, Acryllium, Guttera, and Phasidus.

guinea-goose (gin'ē-gös), n. See goose.

guinea-grains (gin'ē-grānz), n. pl. Same as grains of paradise (which see, under grain[1]).

guinea-green (gin'ē-grēn), n. Same as acid-green.

guinea-hen (gin'ē-hen), n. [Formerly also guinnie-hen, ginnie-hen.] 1. Same as guinea-fowl.

In the orchard adjacent the guinea-hens have clustered into a knot, and keep up a steady and unanimous potrack! potrack! W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 123.

2. A courtezan. [Old slang.]

Ere I would . . . drown myself for the love of a Guinea-hen, I would change my humanity with a baboon.
Shak., Othello, i. 3.

3. A species of fritillary, Fritillaria Meleagris, the petals of which are spotted like the guinea-fowl.—Guinea-hen weed, a West Indian name for the Petiveria alliacea, an acrid phytolaccaceous herb with a garlic-like odor.

Guinea hog. See hog.

Guineaman (gin'ē-man), n.; pl. Guineamen (-men). A ship used in trading to the coast of Guinea.

Guinean (gin'ē-an), a. [< Guinea (see def.) + -an.] Of or pertaining to Guinea, a region extending more than 3,500 miles along the west coast of Africa, divided into Upper and Lower Guinea, and including the Grain, Ivory, Gold, and Slave coasts, and many native kingdoms and European possessions.—Guinean subregion, in zoögeog., a subdivision of the Ethiopian region, beginning on the west coast of Africa where the Libyan subregion ends, comprising an extent of seaboard from Sierra Leone about to Angola, and of unknown extent in the interior. A. Newton, Encyc. Brit., III. 758.

Guinea peach, pepper, plum, etc. See the ★nouns.

★guinea-pig (gin'ē-pig), n. [The guinea-pig (def. 1) does not come from Guinea, and has nothing to do with the pig. The name may involve some comparison with the guinea-fowl; or the first element may be intended for Guiana, adjacent to Brazil, where the animal is found.] 1. The domestic form, in several varieties, of the restless cavy, Cavia aperea, a Brazilian rodent of the family Caviidæ. The black, white, and tawny individuals seen in confinement are supposed by some to be a distinct species, and called C. cobaya; but they are more generally believed to be modified descendants of the wild species. These cavies are readily tamed, and are noted for their extraordinary fecundity.

The genus Cavia includes numerous species more or less like the common guinea-pig, though none of the wild ones resemble the piebald individuals commonly seen in confinement. . . . In domestication, the guinea-pig is probably the most prolific of mammals, the periods of gestation and lactation being remarkably brief, the litters large, and procreation almost continual.
Stand. Nat. Hist., V. 83.

2. The boschvark, Potamochærus africanus.—3. One whose fee is a guinea: a punning name, applied in the quotation to a veterinary surgeon. Davies.

"Oh, oh," cried Pat, "how my hand itches, Thou guinea pig in boots and breeches,
To trounce thee well." Combe, Dr. Syntax, iii. 4.

guinea-worm (gin'ē-wėrm), n. A formidable parasitic nematode or threadworm, Filaria medinensis, of extreme tenuity, from a few inches to several feet long, often infesting the human body, especially in hot countries. See Filaria.

guiniad, n. See gwyniad.

guipure (gē-pūr′), n. [F. guipure, guipure, ★gimp: see gimp[1].] 1. (a) Originally, a lace made of cords of a certain stoutness, each composed of several threads laid side by side, or of a strip of stuff or of parchment (see cartisane), and wound completely with thread. These cords were either arranged so as to touch one another and be sewed together often enough for solidity, or were maintained by means of brides or bars. Hence—(b) A species of gimp: discriminated from (a) only in having the cords made stouter (sometimes of wire) and the pattern formal and regular. In the above senses the full term should be dentelle à guipure.—2. (a) In later use, any lace made in imitation of the ancient lace (a), usually rather large in pattern. Also called Cluny guipure. Hence—(b) Any lace having no ground or mesh, but with the pattern maintained by brides or bars only: in this sense used very loosely.—Cluny guipure, modern lace or passement imitating that of the sixteenth or early seventeenth century, having a formal and even geometrical design, and usually of rather large pattern. The term is applied to such work whether hand-made or machine-made.—Filet guipure. Same as darned lace. See lace.—Guipure Renaissance, a kind of embroidery worked with écru or gray or yellowish silk and coarse cheese-cloth or similar materials, of which cloth small pieces are bound and ornamented with the silk and made into a sort of mosaic or openwork pattern.—Sixty-knotted guipure, a fine Irish fancy work similar to crochet, first exhibited in 1851.—Tape guipure, a manufacture in which flat strips of stuff or tapes woven for the purpose replace the round cord of guipure 2 (a) and 2 (b).

Guiraca (gwi-rā'kȧ), n. [NL. (Swainson, 1827), from a native (Mex.) name.] A genus of American grosbeaks, of the family Fringillidæ, containing such as the blue grosbeak, G. cærulea, common in the United States. The male is of a rich blue, with black face, wings, and tail, and 2 chestnut wing-bars; it is 6½ to 7 inches long, and 10½ to 11 inches in extent of wings; the female is smaller, plain brown; young males when changing are patched with blue and brown. It is not common north of the Middle States. It is a songster, and nests in bushes, vines, and low trees, laying four or five very pale bluish eggs.

guirdle†, n. An obsolete spelling of girdle[1].

guirland†, guirlond†, n. Obsolete forms of garland.

guisard (gī'zärd), n. [Also guizard; < guise + -ard. Cf. guiser.] A guiser; a mummer. [Scotch.]

A high paper cap, with one of their great grandfather's antique coats, then equips them [Scotch youths] as a guisard. Hone's Every-day Book, II. 18.

guisarme†, gisarme†, n. [ME., also gysarme, giserne, geserne, etc.; < OF. guisarme, gisarme, guiserme, guserme, jusarme, gisarne, wisarme = Pr. jusarme, gasarma (ML. gisarma); prob. of Teut. origin.] A long-handled weapon resembling the pole-ax, or in some cases more nearly resembling the halberd, but having a long edge for cutting and a straight sharp point in the line of the handle. By some authors it is confounded with the pole-ax.

With swerd, or sparth, or gysarme.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 5978.

Axes, sperys, and gysarmes gret Clefte many a prowt Mannes heed.
Arthur (ed. Furnivall), l. 463.

Noon durste hym approche ne come vpon the cauchie, but launched to hym speres and gysarmes grounden.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 281.

guise (gīz), n. [< ME. guise, usually gise, gyse, < OF. guise = Pr. Sp. Pg. It. guisa, way, manner, guise, < OHG. wisa, MHG. wise, G. weise = AS. wīse, E. wise, way, manner: see wise[2].] 1. Way; manner; mode; fashion; practice; custom.

Thi thresshing floor be not ferre of awaie,
For beryng and for stelinge, as the gise is Of servauntes.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 36.

To shame the guise o' the world I will begin The fashion less without, and more within.
Shak., Cymbeline, v. 1.

The swain replied, It never was our guise
To slight the poor, or aught humane despise. Pope.

2. Manner of acting; mien; cast or behavior.

Lo you, here she comes! This is her very guise; and, upon my life, fast asleep. Observe her; stand close.
Shak., Macbeth, v. 1.

By their guise
Just men they seem'd. Milton, P. L., xi. 576.

Bashful she bends, her well-taught look aside Turns in enchanting guise. Thomson, Liberty, iv.

3. External appearance as determined by costume; dress; garb: as, the guise of a shepherd.

Now long, now schort, now streyt, now large, now swerded, now daggered, and in alle manere gyses.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 137.

But tak you now a friar's guise,
The voice and gesture feign.
Queen Elcanor's Confession (Child's Ballads, VI. 214).

Hence—4. Appearance or semblance in general; aspect or seeming.

The most artificial men have found it necessary to put on a guise of simplicity and plainness, and make greatest protestations of their honesty when they most lie in wait to deceive. Stillingfleet, Sermons, II. v.

The Hugonots were engaged in a civil war by the specious pretences of some, who, under the guise of religion, sacrificed so many thousands to their own ambition. Swift.

Drank swift death in guise of wine.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, I. 93.

At one's own guise†, in one's own fashion; to suit one's self.

In daunger hadde he at his owne gise
The yonge gurles [the youth] of the diocise.
Chaucer, Gen. Prol. to C. T., l. 663.

guise (gīz), v.; pret. and pp. guised, ppr. guising. [< OF. guiser, put on a guise or disguise; from the noun: see guise, n.] I. intrans. To dress as a guiser; assume or act the part of a guiser. [Eng.]

Then like a guised band, that for a while
Has mimick'd forth a sad and gloomy tale.
J. Baillie.

II. trans. To place a guise or garb on; dress.

To guise ourselues (like counter-faiting ape)
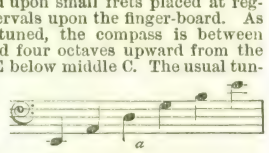
To th' guise of men that are but men in shape.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Vocation.



Abbé Maury did not pull; but the charcoal men brought a mummer guised like him, and he had to pull in effigy.
Carlyle, French Rev., II. i. 11.

guiser (gī'zėr), n. One who goes from house to house whimsically disguised, and making diversion with songs and antics, usually at Christmas; a masker; a mummer. [Eng.]

guissette (gē-set'), n. [OF.: see gusset.] In medieval armor: (a) The light armor for the thigh. See cuishes. (b) Same as gusset.

guitar (gi-tär'), n. [= D. Dan. guitar = G. guitarre = Sw. gitarr, < F. guitare, a later form (after Pr. guitara, Sp. Pg. guitarra, It. chitarra) of OF. guiterre, earlier guiterne (> older E. gittern), < L. cithara, < Gr. κιθάρα, a kind of lyre: see cithara, cithern, cittern, gittern, zither.] A musical instrument of the lute class, having usually six strings (three of catgut and three of silk wound with fine silver wire), stretched over a violin-shaped body, and a long neck and finger-board combined. The strings are plucked or twanged by the right hand, while they are stopped by the left hand upon small frets placed at regular intervals upon the finger-board. As usually tuned, the compass is between three and four octaves upward from the second E below middle C. The usual tuning of the strings is shown at a, the music being written an octave higher. As the fixed frets prevent distant modulations from the normal key of the instrument, a capo tasto is sometimes attached so as to shorten all the strings at once. The guitar is the modern form of a large class of instruments used in all ages and countries. It is most popular in Spain, but has had periods of great popularity in France and England. Its tone is soft and agreeable, and is especially suited for accompaniments.

French Guitar of the 17th century.

guitarist (gi-tär'ist), n. [< guitar + -ist.] A performer upon the guitar.

guitermanite (git'ėr-man-īt), n. [After Franklin Guiterman.] A sulphid of arsenic and lead occurring in masses of a bluish-gray color and metallic luster, found at the Zuñi mine near Silverton, Colorado.

guitguit (gwit'gwit), n. [So called in imitation of its notes.] An American bird of the family Cœrebidæ. The term has been extended as a book-name to some of the old-world sunbirds, erroneously supposed to be related to the guitguits proper. See cut under Cœrebinæ. Compare guidguid, with a different application.

guitonen†, n. [Appar. irreg. for guiton*, < OF. guiton, guyton, giton, witon, a page, varlet.] A varlet.

I do this the more
T' amaze our adversaries to behold
The reverence we give these guitonens.
Middleton, Game at Chess, i. 1.

guivert, n. An obsolete form of quiver.

guivré (gē-vrā'), a. In her., anserated.

guizard, n. Same as guisard.

guizet†, n. An obsolete spelling of guise.

Guizotia (gē-zō'ti-ă), n. [NL., named after F. P. G. Guizot (1787–1874), a French statesman and historian.] A small genus of composite plants resembling the sunflower, natives of tropical Africa. G. Abyssinica is cultivated in many parts of India for the small black seeds, known as Niger or ramtil seeds, from which an oil used for lamps and as a condiment is expressed.

gula (gū'lă), n.; pl. gulæ (-lē). [L., the throat: see *gole*2, gullet, gules.] 1. In arch., a molding, more commonly called cyma reversa or ogee. See cyma, 1.—2. In entom., a piece which in some insects forms the lower surface of the head, behind the mentum, and bounded laterally by the genæ or cheeks. It is conspicuous in the beetles, but in many other insects it appears to be entirely absent, or is represented only by the inferior cervical sclerites, little corneous pieces in the membrane of the neck. See cut under mouth-part.

The inferior cervical sclerites [of the cockroach] are two narrow transverse plates, one behind the other, in the middle line. They appear to represent the part called gula, which in many insects is a large plate confluent with the epicranium above and supporting the submentum anteriorly. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 347.

3. In ornith., the upper part of the throat of a bird, between the mentum and the jugulum. See cut under *bird*1.

The front of the neck has been needlessly subdivided, and these subdivisions vary with almost every writer. It suffices to call it throat (gula, or jugulum), remembering that the jugular portion is lowermost . . . and the gular uppermost, running into chin along the under surface of the head. Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 96.

gulancha (gö-lan'chă), n. [Hind.] The Tinospora cordifolia, a woody menispermaceous climber common in India and Ceylon. The roots and stems are bitter, and possess tonic, antiperiodic, and diuretic properties.

gular (gū'lär), a. and n. [< gula + *-ar*3.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to the gullet or throat in general; jugular; esophageal.—2. Specifically, in zoöl., pertaining to the gula.—Gular plates, in ichth., one or two osseous laminæ between the rami of the lower jaw, occurring in certain fishes, as Amiidæ, Elopidæ, Ceratodontidæ.—Gular pouch, the throat-pouch common to all the steganopodous or totipalmate birds, and found in a few others. It is most highly developed in the pelican, in which it hangs as a great bag under the bill and throat, capable of holding several quarts. See cut under pelican.—Gular sutures. Same as buccal sutures (which see, under buccal).

II. n. A gular plate or shield beneath the throat of a serpent or fish.

gulaund† (gū'lând), n. [< Icel. gulönd, < gulr (= Sw. Dan. gul), yellow, + önd (and-) (= Dan. Sw. and), a duck: see yellow, drake, and anas.] An aquatic fowl, apparently the merganser or goosander.

gulch1† (gulch), v. t. [Also dial. gulge; < ME. gulchen (gulchen in, swallow greedily, gulchen ut, disgorge, eject); mod. E. dial. (unassibilated) gulk, swallow; appar. < Norw. gulka, disgorge, retch up, Sw. gölka, gulch. Cf. D. gulzig, greedy; cf. also gulp.] To swallow greedily. [Prov. Eng.]

gulch1† (gulch), n. [< *gulch*1, v.] 1. A swallowing or devouring.—2. A glutton; a fat, stupid fellow.

Then you'll know us, you'll see us then, you will, gulch.
B. Jonson, Poetaster, iii. 1.

You muddy gulch, dar'st look me in the face, while mine eyes sparkle with revengeful fire?
A. Brewer, Lingua, v. 16.

gulch2 (gulch), v. i. [Perhaps connected with *gulch*1.] To fall heavily. [Prov. Eng.]

gulch2 (gulch), n. [< *gulch*2, v.] A heavy fall. [Prov. Eng.]

gulch3 (gulch), n. [Origin uncertain; perhaps connected with *gulch*2. There appears to be no etymological connection with *gully*1.] 1. A gorge; a ravine; any narrow valley or ravine of small dimensions and steep sides. [Pacific States.]

The lower gulches, lined with aspens, in autumn show a streak of faded gold. The Century, XXXI. 60.

Obverse. Reverse.

Silver Gulden of William III., King of the Netherlands, 1867; British Museum. (Size of the original.)

gulden (göl'den), n. [G. gulden, also gülden, a florin, < gülden = E. *gilden*1, golden: see *gilden*1, golden, *gilder*2.] 1. One of several gold coins formerly current in Germany from the fourteenth century, and in the Low Countries from the fifteenth century: the name was afterward applied to silver coins of Germany and the Netherlands.—2. A former silver coin of Austria, worth 1*s.* 8*d.* English, or about 40 cents; also, a current silver coin of the kingdom of the Netherlands, of equal value. See cut in preceding column.

guldenhead (göl'den-hed), n. [A dial. var. of goldenhead.] The common puffin, Fratercula arctica. Montagu.

gule1†, n. [ME. gule, < OF. gule, gole, < L. gula, throat, gullet, gluttony: see *gole*2, gules.] 1. The throat; the gullet. Davies.

There are many throats so wide and gules so gluttonous in England that they can swallow down goodly Cathedrals. Bp. Gauden, Tears of the Church, p. 323.

2. Gluttony.

This vice, whiche so oute of reule
Hath set us alle, is clepid gule.
Gower, MS. Soc. Antiq., 134, f. 176. (Halliwell.)

gule2†, v. t. [< gule-s.] In her., to give the color of gules to.

Achilles durst not looke on Hector when He guld his silver armes in Greekish bloud.
Heywood, Troia Britannica (1609).

gule3†, n. [ML. gula Augusti, F. la goule d'Août, la goule d'Août; appar. lit. 'the throat of August,' i. e., the beginning (see *gule*1, *gole*2); but said to be orig. W. gwyl Awst, feast of August: gwyl, festival, feast; Awst, August: see *August*2.] A term occurring in the phrase gule of August, Lammas day (August 1st).

gule4, v. i.; pret. and pp. guled, ppr. guling. [E. dial.] To laugh or grin; sneer; boast.

gules (gūlz), n. [A later form, taking the place of ME. goules, gowles, goulys, gowlys, < OF. gueules, F. gueules, gules, red, or sanguine in blazon (< ML. gulæ); pl. of OF. gole, goule, later and mod. F. gueule, the mouth, the jaws, prop. the open jaws, the reference in gules being prob. to the color of the open mouth of the heraldic lion, < L. gula, throat: see *gule*1. The "derivation" from Pers. gul, a rose, is a poetical fancy.] In her., the tincture red: in representations without color, as in drawing or engraving, it is indicated by vertical lines drawn close together.

Gules.

Bot syr Gawayne for grefe myghte noghte agayne-stande,
Umbegrippys a spere, and to a gome rynnys,
That bare of gowles fulle gaye, with gowces of sylvere.
Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), l. 3760.

Her face he makes his shield,
Where roses gules are borne in silver field.
Sir P. Sidney (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 509).

Follow thy drum;
With man's blood paint the ground, gules, gules.
Shak., T. of A., iv. 3.

Full on this casement shone the wintry moon,
And threw warm gules on Madeline's fair breast.
Keats, Eve of St. Agnes.

gulf (gulf), n. [Formerly often gulph, sometimes goulfe (= D. golf, a wave, billow, gulf, = G. golf, a bay); < OF. golfe, goulfe, a gulf, whirlpool, F. golfe, a gulf (bay), a later form (after It. golfo, etc.) of OF. goufre, F. goufre, a gulf, abyss, pit, = Pr. Sp. Pg. It. golfo, a gulf, bay, < LGr. κόλφος, Gr. κόλπος, the bosom, lap, a deep hollow, a bay, a creek (cf. L. sinus in similar senses: see sine).] 1. A large tract of water extending from the ocean or a sea into the land, following an indentation of the coastline: as, the Gulf of Mexico; the Gulf of Venice. A gulf is usually understood to be larger than a bay and smaller than a sea; but in many cases this distinction is not observed. Thus, the Arabian sea on one side of the Indian peninsula is of nearly the same size and shape as the Bay of Bengal on the other, while the Bay of Biscay is many times larger than the Gulf of Genoa.

They [the Venetians] prohibiting all traffique elsewhere throughout the whole Gulph. Sandys, Travailes, p. 1.

2. An abyss; a chasm; a deep place in the earth: as, the gulf of Avernus.

Between us and you there is a great gulf fixed.
Luke xvi. 26.

A gulf profound as that Serbonian bog
Betwixt Damiata and Mount Casius old,
Where armies whole have sunk.
Milton, P. L., ii. 592.

The heavens between their fairy fleeces pale Sow'd all their mystic gulfs with fleeting stars.
Tennyson, Gardener's Daughter.

3. Something that engulfs or swallows, as the gullet, or a whirlpool; figuratively, misfortune.

Hast thou not read in bookes of fell Charybdis goulfe?
Turberville, Pyndara's Answer to Tymetes.

England his approaches makes as fierce
As waters to the sucking of a gulf.
Shak., Hen. V., ii. 4.

A gulf of ruin, swallowing gold.
Tennyson, Sea Dreams.

4. A wide interval, as in station, education, and the like: as, the gulf that separates the higher and lower classes.—5. In Cambridge University, England, the position of those candidates for mathematical honors who fail to obtain a place on the list but are allowed the ordinary degree; in Oxford, the list of those who fail to obtain honors, yet are allowed to take a 'pass.' N. E. D. [Slang.]

The ranks of our curatehood are supplied by youths whom at the very best merciful examiners have raised from the very gates of "pluck" to the comparative paradise of the gulf. Saturday Rev.

Some ten or fifteen men just on the line, not bad enough to be plucked or good enough to be placed, are put into the gulf, as it is popularly called (the Examiners' phrase is "Degrees allowed"), and have their degrees given them, but are not printed in the Calendar.
C. A. Bristed, English University, p. 259.

6. In mining, a large deposit of ore in a lode.—Gulf Stream, an oceanic current which first becomes apparent in the Gulf of Mexico (whence its name) near the north coast of Cuba, whence it advances eastward to the Bahamas, then, turning northward, follows the Atlantic coast with a velocity of from 2 to 5 miles an hour, gradually expanding in breadth and diminishing in depth, and so losing the quality of a 'stream,' properly defined, and becoming a 'drift': as such, it is distinctly perceived beyond the eastern edge of Newfoundland as far as about 30 degrees west longitude. Its average breadth from Bermuda to the neighborhood of Nova Scotia is from 300 to 400 miles. Its comparatively high temperature (10 to 20 degrees above that of the surrounding ocean), rapid motion, and deep-blue color make the Gulf Stream a most remarkable phenomenon, and even more interesting than the Kuro Siwo, the corresponding current on the Asiatic coast of the Pacific ocean. The extension of the Gulf Stream in the drift of the northeastern Atlantic exerts a most important influence in moderating the climate of France, the British Isles, and other parts of western Europe. The distance to which the extension of the Gulf Stream is felt in a northeasterly direction has been the subject of much discussion among thalassographers.

The heated water of the Gulf Stream turns northeastward and crosses the Atlantic . . . traceable by its warmth even into the Arctic seas. A. Geikie, Phys. Geog., p. 168.

gulf (gulf), v. [Formerly also gulph; < gulf, n. Cf. engulf.] I. trans. 1. To swallow; engulf; cast down, as into a gulf.

Cast himself down,
And gulf'd his griefs in inmost sleep.
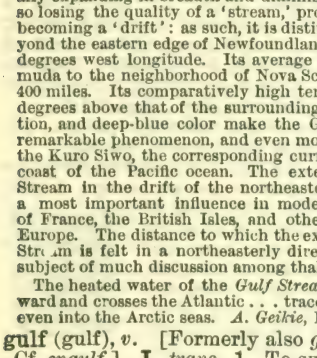
Tennyson, Pelleas and Ettarre.



2. In the University of Cambridge, to place in the gulf, or among those students who have barely escaped being plucked in their final examination.

Being gulfed was therefore about as bad for a Small-College as being plucked, since it equally destroyed his chance of a Fellowship.
C. A. Bristed, English University, p. 259.

II.† intrans. To flow like the waters of a gulf.

Then doo the Aetnean Cyclops him affray,
And deep Charybdis gulphing in and out.
Spenser, Virgil's Gnat, l. 543.

gulfweed (gulf′wēd), n. A coarse olive seaweed, Sargassum bacciferum, belonging to the subclass Fucaceæ. It has its specific name from the numerous grape-like air-vessels by which it is buoyed. It was first discovered by Columbus. S. vulgare is also sometimes called gulfweed. Gulfweed grows attached in the West Indies, where it fruits, and is found floating and infertile in the course of the Gulf Stream and in the Sargasso sea (a tract of water so called from the masses of floating gulfweed in it, sometimes so dense as to impede navigation), from latitude 20° to 45° N. Farlow, Marine Algæ of New England. Also called driftweed.

Branch of Gulfweed (Sargassum bacciferum). a, vesicle with leaf; b, mucronate vesicle.

gulfy (gul′fi), a. [Formerly also gulphy; < gulf + -y[1].] Full of gulfs or whirlpools.

To pass the gulfy purple sea that did no sea-rites know.
Chapman.

Rivers, arise; whether thou be the son
Of utmost Tweed, or Oose, or gulphy Dun.
Milton, Vacation Exercise, l. 92.

And gulphy Simoïs, rolling to the main Helmets, and shields, and godlike heroes slain.
Pope, Iliad, xii.

gul-gul (gul′gul), n. [E. Ind.] A sort of chunam or cement made of pounded sea-shells mixed with oil, which hardens like stone, and is used in India to cover ships' bottoms. It is impenetrable by worms even when unprotected by copper.

gulinula (gū-lin′ū-lä), n. [NL., < L. gula, throat, + -in- + dim. -ula.] A name given by Hyatt to that stage of development of a young actinozoan, as a coral, which comes next after the hydroplanula, and in which an actinostome or gullet is formed. See the extract.

During this process [invagination of the blastopore] the blastopore is carried inwards, and the internal opening of the actinostome thus becomes the homologue of the primitive blastopore of the hydroplanula, and also represents the external orifice of the body of the Hydrozoa. This [is the] gullet-larval or gulinula stage.
Hyatt, Proc. Bost. Soc. Nat. Hist., 1884, p. 118.

gulinular (gū-lin′ū-lär), a. [< gulinula + -ar[3].] Of or pertaining to a gulinula. Also gullet-larval.

gulist† (gū′list), n. [Equiv. to L. gulo(n-), a glutton, < gula, the gullet: see gule[1], gole[2].] A glutton.

gull[1] (gul), n. [< ME. goll (rare), an unfledged bird, prob. < Icel. golr, usually gulr = Sw. Dan. gul, yellow (cf. gulaund), = E. yellow, in reference to the yellow color of the beak (cf. F. béjaune, a novice, lit. 'yellow-beak'), or, in the case of the gosling, to the yellow color of the young feathers: see yellow.] 1†. An unfledged bird; a nestling.

If a nest of briddis thou fyndist, and the moder to the bryddis [in another MS. golli's] or to the eyren above sittynge, thow shalt not hold hyr with the sones.
Wyclif, Deut. xxii. 6 (Oxf.).

You used us so
As that ungentle gull the cuckoo's bird
Useth the sparrow. Shak., 1 Hen. IV., v. 1.

2. A gosling. [Prov. Eng.]—3. A large trout. [Scotch.] Compare gullfish.—4. The bloom of the willow in the spring. [Prov. Eng.]—5. A simpleton; a fool; a dupe; one easily cheated.

Yond' gull Malvolio is turned heathen, a very renegado.
Shak., T. N., iii. 2.

The contemporary world is apt to be the gull of brilliant parts. Lowell, Study Windows, p. 113.

6. A cheating or cheat; a trick; fraud.

To be revenged on you for the gull you put upon him.
Chapman, All Fools, iv. 1.

I should think this a gull, but that the white-bearded fellow speaks it. Shak., Much Ado, ii. 3.

7. [Cf. hull-gull.] A kind of game. Moor. [Prov. Eng.]

gull[1] (gul), v. t. [< gull[1], n., 5, 6.] To deceive; cheat; mislead by deception; trick; defraud.

Keep your money, be not gulled, be not laughed at.
Fletcher (and another), Fair Maid of the Inn, iv. 2.

In the night time by some fire-workes in the steeple, they would haue gulled the credulous people with opinion of miracle. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 271.

The vulgar, gull'd into rebellion, armed. Dryden.

★=Syn. To dupe, cozen, beguile, impose upon.

gull[2] (gul), n. [< Corn. gullan = W. gwylan = Bret. gwelan, a gull. Cf. guillemot.] 1. A long-winged, web-footed bird of the subfamily Larinæ, family Laridæ, and order Longipennes. There are more than 50 species, inhabiting all parts of the world, belonging chiefly to the leading genus Larus; other genera are Chroïcocephalus, Xema, and Rhodostethia. Many of the species are marine or maritime, but gulls are also found over most of the large bodies of fresh water of the globe. They are strong and buoyant fliers, spending much of the time on the wing, and are voracious feeders upon fish or any animal substances which they can find in the water. They do not dive. The nest is usually placed on the ground or on rocks, and the eggs are two or three in number and heavily colored. The voice is raucous or shrill, and the birds are very noisy, especially during the breeding season. The characteristic coloration is white with a pearly, bluish, or fuscous mantle, the primaries usually marked with black; the white in some cases has a beautiful rosy hue. In one group of species the head is enveloped in a dark-colored hood; in another the whole plumage is dark, except the white head; in the ivory gull the entire plumage is white. In the kittiwakes, which constitute the genus Rissa, the hind toe is rudimentary. Among representative species are the ice-gull or burgomaster, Larus glaucus, and the great black-backed gull, L. marinus, these two being the largest species; the herring-gull, L. argentatus; the mew-gull, L. canus; the hooded gulls, Chroïcocephalus atricilla; the fork-tailed gull, Xema sabinei; and the wedge-tailed gull, Rhodostethia rosea. In the larger gulls the bill is strong and hooked; in the smaller kinds it is slenderer and straighter, and these grade directly into the terns or sea-swallows. See cuts under burgomaster and Chroïcocephalus.

Common Gull, or Mew-gull (Larus canus).

2. It resembles gum arabic.—Moist gum. Same as dextrine.—Plastic gum, gutta-percha.—Sassa gum, a product of Albizzia fastigiata, resembling tragacanth.—Semla gum, gum obtained from Bauhinia retusa, a leguminous tree of the Himalayas. It is similar to gum arabic.—Sonora gum, the resin which covers the creosote-plant, Covillea tridentata, used as a remedy for rheumatism, etc.—Sweet gum, a balsamic exudation from Liquidambar styraciflua. (See also balata-gum, chicle-gum, doctor-gum, hog-gum, spruce-gum, etc.)

gum[2] (gum), v.; pret. and pp. gummed, ppr. gumming. [< gum[2], n.] I. trans. 1. To smear with gum; unite, stiffen, or clog by gum or a gum-like substance.

I have removed Falstaff's horse, and he frets like a gummed velvet. Shak., 1 Hen. IV., ii. 2.

[Velvet and taffeta were sometimes stiffened with gum to make them look shiny or sit better; but the consequence was that the stuff, being thus hardened, quickly rubbed and fretted itself out. Halliwell.]

The gummed wafer bore on it the impress of a gilt coronet. Trollope, Barchester Towers.

2. To play a trick upon; humbug; hoodwink: said to be from the fact that opossums and racoons often elude hunters and dogs by hiding in the thick foliage of gum-trees. [Slang, U. S.]

You can't gum me, I tell you now,
An' so you needn't try.
Lowell, Biglow Papers, 1st ser.

II. intrans. 1. To exude or form gum. See gumming, 1.—2. To become clogged or stiffened by some gummy substance, as inspissated oil: as, a machine will gum up from disuse.

gum-animal (gum'an″i-mal), n. A book-name of Galago senegalensis, a kind of lemur, translating a Moorish name referring to the fact that the animal feeds upon gum senegal. See Galago.

gumbt, n. An obsolete spelling of gum[2].

gumbo[1] (gum'bō), n. [Also gombo; < Angolan kingombo, < ki- + ngombo. J. Platt, Jr.] 1. The pod of the okra.—2. A soup, usually of chicken, thickened with okra.

The millions of Yankees — from codfish to alligators . . . cooks of chowder or cooks of gumbo.
T. Winthrop, Canoe and Saddle, iii.

3. A dish made of young capsules of okra, seasoned with salt and pepper, and stewed and served with melted butter.

gumbo[2] (gum'bō), n. [Appar. of some native origin (?).] A patois spoken by West Indian and Louisianian creoles and negroes.

English, German, French, and Spanish, all were represented, to say nothing of Doric brogue and local gumbo, and its voluble exercise was set off by a vehemence of utterance and gesture curiously at variance with the reticence of our Virginians. The Century, XXXI. 618.

"Laroussel, you're the only Creole in this crowd," said the captain; "talk to her! Talk gumbo to her!"
Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 749.

gum-boil (gum'boil), n. A small abscess on the gum.

gumbo-limbo (gum'bō-lim″bō), n. Same as Jamaica or West Indian birch (which see, under birch).

gumby (gum'bi), n.; pl. gumbies (-biz). [W. Ind., < Kongo nkombi.] A kind of drum used by the negroes of the West Indies, made of a piece of a hollow tree, about 6 feet long, over which a skin is stretched. It is carried by one man while another beats it with his open hands.

A squad of drunken black vagabonds, singing and playing on gumbies, or African drums. M. Scott.

gum-cistus (gum'sis″tus), n. A plant, Cistus ladaniferus, yielding ladanum. See Cistus, 2, and ladanum.

gum-drop (gum'drop), n. 1. In phar., a confection composed of gum arabic and cane-sugar, esteemed as a demulcent. U. S. Dispensatory. —2. In confectionery, a similar preparation, often made with glucose and gelatin, and variously flavored.

gum-dynamite (gum'dī″na-mīt), n. Same as explosive gelatin. See gelatin.

gum-game (gum'gām), n. [See gum[2], v. t., 2.] A hoodwinking trick; a guileful artifice; an imposition: as, to play the gum-game. [Slang, U. S.]

gumma (gum'ä), n.; pl. gummata (-a-tä). [ML., a var. of L. gummi, gum: see gum[2].] In pathol., a kind of tumor produced by syphilis, so called from the resemblance of its contents to gum.

gummatous (gum'a-tus), a. [< gumma(t-) + -ous.] In pathol., of the nature of a gumma or soft tumor.

The gummatous degeneration of the products of syphilitic infection is not always easily distinguished from the caseous. Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 390.

These symptoms and signs are due to gummatous infiltration of the lung. Medical News, LII. 597.

★gummer (gum'ėr), n. [< gum[1], v., + -er[1].] A tool or machine for gulleting saws, or for enlarging the spaces between the teeth of worn saws.

gummiferous (gu-mif'e-rus), a. [< L. gummi, gum, + ferre = E. bear[1].] Producing gum.

gumminess (gum'i-nes), n. 1. The state or quality of being gummy; viscousness.—2. An accumulation of gum.

One of about twenty years of age came to me with a gumminess on the tendons reaching to his fingers, insomuch as he could not bend one of them.
Wiseman, Surgery, viii.

gumming (gum'ing), n. [Verbal n. of gum[2], v.] 1. A disease in trees bearing stone-fruits, as cherries, plums, apricots, peaches, and almonds. It is characterized by the production of brown or amber-colored gum that exudes from wounds on the trunk, limbs, or even fruit. The cause has not been satisfactorily determined. Also gum.

2. The treatment of the prepared and etched lithographic stone with gum-water, to cause the untouched portions to resist the ink. See lithography.

Gumminia (gu-min'i-ä), n. [NL., < L. gummi, gum.] A genus of fleshy sponges, giving name to the order Gumminiinæ. Also Gummina. Oscar Schmidt, 1862.

Gumminiinæ (gu-min-i-ī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Gumminia + -inæ.] An order or other superfamily group of fleshy sponges or Carneospongiæ, including tough leathery forms, the external layer of which forms a partly fibrous cortex, the fibers permeating the central mass surrounding the canals, and also penetrating the mesoderm. Also Gummininæ. Stand. Nat. Hist., I. 63.

gummite (gum'īt), n. [< L. gummi, gum, + -ite[2].] An orange-yellow mineral consisting chiefly of hydrous oxid of uranium, produced by the alteration of uraninite.

★gummosis (gu-mō'sis), n. [NL., < L. gummi, gum, + -osis.] In bot., an abnormal condition of certain trees such as the cherry, plum, olive, etc., which causes the formation of gum and its exudation through the bark.

gummosity (gu-mos'i-ti), n. [= OF. gommosite, < L. gummosus, gummous: see gummous.] Gumminess; the nature of gum; a viscous or adhesive quality. [Rare.]

gummous (gum'us), a. [= F. gommeux = Pr. gomos = Sp. gomoso = Pg. It. gommoso, < L. gummosus (also cumminosus), gummy, < gummi, cummi, gum. see gum[2].] Of the nature or quality of gum; viscous; adhesive.

Of this we have an instance in the magisteries . . . of jalap, bensoin, and of divers other resinous or gummous bodies dissolved in spirit of wine. Boyle, Works, IV. 337.

The thoughts rise heavily and pass gummous thro' my pen. Sterne, Tristram Shandy, ix. 13.

gummy (gum'i), a. [< gum[2] + -y[1].] 1. Consisting of gum; of the nature of gum; viscous; adhesive.

Heer, for hard Cement, heap they night and day
The gummy slime of chalkie waters gray.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., Babylon.

From the utmost end of the head branches there issueth out a gummy juice, which hangeth downward like a cord.
Raleigh.

2. Impregnated with gum; giving out gum; covered with or clogged by gum or viscous matter.

The gummy bark of fir or pine. Milton, P. L., x. 1076.

The yawning youth, scarce half awake, essays
His lazy limbs and dozy head to raise;
Then rubs his gummy eyes, and scrubs his pate.
Dryden.

3. In pathol., pertaining to or having the nature of a gumma; gummatous.—4. Having an accumulation of gum, or matter resembling gum; stuffy; puffy; swollen. [Slang.]

A little gummy in the leg, I suppose.
Colman the Younger, Poor Gentleman.

gump (gump), n. [Perhaps < Icel. gumpr = Sw. Dan. gump, the rump.] A foolish person; a dolt. [Colloq.]

C. . . . is still a gump, and is constantly regretting that she ever left the "dear old Hengland" in which she was so notoriously prosperous and happy.
Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 148.

gum-plant (gum'plant), n. A plant of the genus Grindelia: so called from the viscid secretion which covers them. [California.]

gum-pot (gum'pot), n. A metal pot in which the materials for varnish are melted and mixed.

gumption (gump'shon), n. [Also gumshion, dial. gawmtion; orig. dial., irreg. < gaum[1], gawm, understand (see gaum[1]), + -tion.] Acuteness of the practical understanding; clear, practical common sense; quick perception of the right thing to do under unusual circumstances. [Colloq.]

One does not have gumption till one has been properly cheated. Bulwer, Eugene Aram, i. 9.

What the French applaud — and not amiss —
As "savoir-faire" (I do not know the Dutch);
The literal Germans call it "Mutterwiss,"
The Yankees gumption, and the Grecians "nous"—
A useful thing to have about the house.
J. G. Saxe, The Wife's Revenge.

Mr. Miller's is what that teacher and Royal Academician, who was a man of zeal, often called "a book full of gumption." Athenæum, Jan. 14, 1888, p. 55.

gumptionless (gump'shon-les), a. [Also gumshonless; < gumption + -less.] Without gumption or understanding; foolish. [Colloq.]

gumptious (gump'shus), a. [Also gumshus; cf. gumption.] 1. Having gumption; having quick perception and good judgment. — 2. Supercilious; conceitedly proud. [Colloq. and prov. Eng.]

"She holds her head higher, I think," said the landlord, smiling. "She was always — not exactly proud like, but what I calls gumptious." Bulwer, My Novel, iv. 12.

gum-rash (gum'rash), n. Same as red-gum.

gum-resin (gum'rez″in), n. A vegetable secretion formed of resin mixed with more or less gum or mucilage. The gum-resins do not flow naturally from plants, but are mostly extracted by incision, in the form of white, yellow, or red emulsive fluids, which dry and consolidate. The more important are olibanum, galbanum, scammony, gamboge, euphorbium, asafetida, aloes, myrrh, and ammoniac.

gum-stick (gum'stik), n. A small piece of some hard substance, as of ivory or coral, given to children to bite on for the purpose of relieving the pains of teething.

gumtion† (gum'shon), n. [A trade-name, irreg. < gum[2] + -tion, perhaps suggested by the form of gumption.] Magilp, as made by drying gum mastic into a strong drying oil in which sugar of lead was substituted for the litharge previously used. The name is not now in use. See magilp.

gumtop-tree (gum'top-trē), n. An Australian tree, Eucalyptus Sieberiana.

gum-tree (gum'trē), n. See gum[2], 3.

gum-water (gum'wâ″tėr), n. A distillation from gum.

gum-wood (gum'wůd), n. 1. The wood of a gum-tree. — 2. A plant of the genus Commidendron, an arborescent composite peculiar to the island of St. Helena. [Properly gumwood.]

gun[1] (gun), n. [< ME. gunne, gonne, rarely goone, goune, gune; origin obscure. The word occurs first in the 14th century, applied both to guns in the mod. sense, and also (appar. earlier) to engines of the mangonel or catapult kind, for throwing stones, etc.; the ML. glosses, mangonale, petraria, fundibulum, murusculum, gunna, etc., are consequently ambiguous. According to a recent suggestion of Professor Skeat, for which there is much collateral evidence, the word was prob. orig. a pet name for a ballista or catapult, ult. < Icel. Gunna, Sw. Gunne, reduced from Icel. Gunnhildr (> ME. Gunnild), a fem. name, < gunnr (AS. gūth), battle, + hildr (AS. hild), war. The Ir. Gael. gunna, W. gwn, a gun, are all from the ME.] 1†. A military engine of the mangonel or catapult kind, used for throwing stones.

Gun.

A, breech; B, barrel; C, band; D, breech-block; E, butt; F, butt- or heel-plate; G, front sight or bead; H, guard- or trigger-plate; I, guard-bow; K, hammer; L, lock; M, peep-sight; N, N, pipes; O, pistol-grip; P, rear sight; Q, receiver; R, side-screws or -nails; S, S, stock; T, tip; U, trigger; V, wiping-rod.

They dradde noon assaut
Of gynne, gunne, nor skaffaut.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 4176.

The word gun was in use in England for an engine, to cast a thing from a man, long before there was any gunpowder found out.
Selden, Table-Talk, Language.

2. A metallic tube or tubular barrel, with its stock or carriage and attachments, from which missiles are thrown, as by the explosive force of gunpowder or other explosive placed behind them at the closed end of the tube, and ignited through a small hole or vent; in general, any firearm except the pistol and the mortar. Guns are distinguished as cannons, muskets, rifles, carbines, fowling-pieces, etc. In military usage, however, only cannon in their various forms and sizes are called guns (collectively ordnance, and familiarly often great guns), the others being called small arms. In humorous use pistols also are often called guns. See cannon, 1.

Throughout every regioun
Wente this foule trumpes soun,
As swift as a pellet out of gonne
When pelet is in the poudre ronne.
Chaucer, House of Fame, l. 1643.

At our going off, the Fort against which our pinnace ankered saluted my Lord Marshall with 12 greate guns, which we answered with 3. Evelyn, Diary, Oct. 10, 1641.

So he come a-riding in with his gun [a revolver] and began shooting. The Century, XXXVI. 834.

3. Specifically, a comparatively long cannon used for obtaining high velocities with low trajectories, as distinguished from a howitzer or a mortar. — 4. In hunting, one who carries a gun; a member of a shooting-party. [Colloq.] — 5. A tall cylindrical jug in use in the north of England. — 6. In plate-glass manuf., a device for fixing the breadth of the plate. It consists of two plates of cast metal, placed in front of the roller and bolted together by cross-bars at a distance apart which can be easily altered and adjusted according to the breadth of plate the apparatus is intended to control. Encyc. Brit., X. 662. — Accelerating gun. See accelerate. — Armstrong gun, an English gun of wrought-iron, invented by Sir W. G. Armstrong about 1855, ranging from the smallest field-piece to pieces of the largest caliber, constructed principally of spirally coiled bars, and generally having an inner tube or core of steel, rifled with numerous shallow grooves. The breech-loading projectile, which is coated with lead, is inserted into a chamber behind the bore, and is driven forward by the explosion with the effect of forcing its soft coating into the grooves, so that it receives a rotary motion. The commonest form of the gun is breech-loading; but muzzle-loading Armstrong guns also are made. — As sure as a gun, quite sure; certainly. [Colloq.]

Coniers with his dagger a promising assassin; the guns and firelocks dead-doing things; as sure, they say, as a gun. Roger North, Examen, p. 168.

Axis of a gun. See axis[1]. — Bailey gun, a battery-gun, not in use, in which the cartridges were placed in a hopper, and, descending, were fed automatically to a group of barrels arranged parallel to each other. It was worked by turning a crank. — Balloon gun, a gun used for the attack of military balloons. It is ordinarily a rapid-fire rifled gun of about 1½ inches' caliber, discharging a shell weighing about one pound. It is usually provided with a mount of great flexibility, so that it can be readily trained to any angle of elevation. — Barbette gun. See barbette. — Big gun. See great gun. — Body of a gun. See body. — Bomb-gun, a gun used for shooting a lance in killing whales. It may be a shoulder- or a swivel-gun, or resemble the darting-gun, which is thrust by hand; but the term is more generally applied to the shoulder-gun, of which there are several patterns, both breech- and muzzle-loading. — Bomb-lance gun, a bomb-gun. — Brown segmental gun, a composite gun consisting of a thin central tube surrounded by staves or segments of steel, the whole being wound with steel wire under an initial compression slightly less than the elastic limit of the steel composing the segments. — Built-up gun, a general term applied to all guns composed of several parts. The parts are assembled upon various systems, the general aim of all being to establish a system of parts that shall best resist the internal strains set up by the explosive gases of the powder. The exterior hoops or jackets are shrunk on over the internal parts by first expanding by heat and cooling in position. — Centrifugal gun. See cen rifugal. — Crozier wire-wound gun, a gun composed of a heavy tube wrapped with steel wire. The special feature of its construction is the initial compression of the tube beyond the elastic limit of the metal. — Dahlgren gun, a smooth-bore gun of cast-iron, invented by Lieutenant (afterward Rear-admiral) J. A. Dahlgren (1809–70) of the United States navy. Its principal peculiarities are the unbroken smoothness of its surface and the relation of its thickness at all points (determined by experiment) to the pressure in firing. — Evening gun (milit. and naval), the warning gun at sunset. In the United States army the time of challenging is regulated by post-commanders, and it is generally later than the time of firing the evening gun. In the United States navy the evening gun is fired from flag-ships at 9 o'clock P. M. — Fraser gun. Same as Woolwich gun. — Gardner gun. Same as Gardner machine-gun. See machine-gun. — Gatling gun, an American form of mitrailleuse or machine-gun, invented by Dr. R. J. Gatling, and first used in the civil war. This gun was the successful pioneer of the machine-guns. It has from 5 to 10 barrels, with a lock for each barrel; the barrels are arranged in a cluster around a central axis, and both barrels and locks revolve together. The cartridges are fed from a feed-case into a hopper on top, and in the later models from a feed-magazine. With the 10-barrel gun a fire of about 1,000 shots per minute can be delivered. These guns are made of the following calibers: 0.30, 0.42, 0.43, 0.45, 0.50, 0.55, 0.65, 0.75, and 1 inch. They are mounted upon a tripod or a carriage, according to the service for which they are intended. See cut in preceding column. — Great gun. (a) A cannon. (b) A person of distinction or importance: more commonly called a big gun. [Colloq.] — Great guns! a familiar ejaculation of surprise. [Colloq.] — Gun detachment. See detachment. — Gun fence. See fence. — Guns of position, heavy field-pieces which are not designed to execute quick movements. — Horse-artillery gun, a light field-piece intended for rapid movements and to accompany cavalry. — Krupp gun, a steel cannon made at the Krupp works in Essen, Prussia. These guns are made from ingot steel and of all calibers. See fermeture. — Land-service gun, any piece of ordnance designed for use upon land. It includes mountain, field, siege, and sea-coast artillery. — Lebel gun, a magazine-gun used in the French army. — Lyle gun, a bronze life-saving gun, designed by Captain D. A. Lyle of the United States Ordnance Department, for throwing elongated projectiles having lines attached to them, in order to establish communication between the shore and a stranded or wrecked vessel. The projectile has at the rear end a shank, to which the line is attached. — Mauser gun, a magazine bolt-gun used in the German army. — Morning gun, a gun fired on a ship of war or at a military post or camp as the first note of the reveille is sounded on the drum, bugle, or trumpet; a reveille gun. — Mountain gun. See mountain-artillery, under artillery. — Multicharge gun, a gun constructed to receive two or more separate charges of powder, which are fired consecutively in rapid succession: as, the Lyman-Haskell multicharge gun. The charge in the breech-chamber is ignited by a friction or other primer; this charge starts the projectile forward, and as its base passes consecutively the openings of the subsidiary chambers or pockets, the charges contained therein are ignited. — Napoleon gun, a bronze 12-pounder used for field-artillery, first adopted in France about 1856, under Napoleon III. — Neck of a gun. See neck. — Paixhans gun, a howitzer for the horizontal firing of heavy shells, introduced by the French general H. J. Paixhans about 1825. — Palliser gun, a cast-iron gun lined with a tube of coiled wrought-iron, invented by Major Palliser of the British army about 1870. The tube is made in two parts, the breech-end being shrunk on. This system was designed to utilize the old smooth-bore ordnance, by converting it into rifled guns. — Parrott gun, a cast-iron rifled gun strengthened at the breech by shrinking coils of wrought-iron over it, invented by Captain Parrott of the Cold Spring foundry in New York, and first used in 1861. The calibers are 10-, 20-, 30-, 100-, 200-, and 300-pounders. The Parrott projectile is of cast-iron, with a brass plate, or sabot, cast into a recessed rabbet to prevent turning. The powder-gas presses against the bottom and under it so as to expand it into the grooves, and thus assures rotary motion to the projectile. — Pneumatic gun, a gun employing compressed air for discharging a shell charged with high explosives. The pneumatic gun adopted by the United States for coast defense has a caliber of 15 inches and throws a shell carrying from 150 to 500 pounds of explosive gelatin. It has a range of three miles. — Powder pneumatic gun, a pneumatic gun in which the explosion of a small charge of gunpowder is used to compress the air used for discharging the shell. — Quaker gun, a log of wood mounted on wheels or some other arrangement, imitating a cannon, designed to deceive the enemy: so called in humorous allusion to the peace doctrines of the Quakers or Friends. — Quick-fire gun, a name sometimes given to large rapid-fire guns, especially to one that uses a projectile that is separate from the case containing the powder. — Rampart gun, a large piece of artillery fitted for use on a rampart, and not for field purposes. — Rapid-fire gun, a breech-loading gun of from 1½ to 8 inches' caliber which uses metallic ammunition. Each type is designated by the name of the inventor of the breech-loading system used, as the Gerdom, Fletcher, Seabury, Dashiel, Canet, Schneider, Armstrong, Driggs-Schröder, Maxim-Nordenfelt, Hotchkiss, Gruson, and others. — Rodman gun, a cast-iron gun with curved outline, being much thicker over the seat of the charge than elsewhere. The peculiarity of this gun is the method of casting, devised by General Rodman of the United States Ordnance Department, and first employed in 1860. Instead of cooling from the exterior, as in the ordinary method, General Rodman cast all large guns with a hollow core, and cooled them from the interior by a stream of cold water or air, at the same time preventing undue radiation from the exterior by surrounding the flask holding the casting with heating-furnaces. — Sims-Dudley pneumatic gun, a powder pneumatic gun, the best known form of which consists of three parallel tubes, of which the center one is much longer than the other two. Both the center and right-hand tubes open at the breech, the former for the introduction of the projectile and the latter for the powder charge. In action, the powder is exploded in the right barrel and the gases pass to its front end, then across to the left barrel, and are finally admitted behind the projectile in the center barrel, mixed with the air in the two side barrels which has been compressed by the process. Shells containing sensitive high explosives can thus be discharged without shock sufficient to cause explosion. — Son of a gun, a rogue; a knave: used humorously. — Spencer gun, an American magazine-rifle containing seven cartridges in a metallic tube, which is inserted in the butt-stock from the rear. The magazine is operated by a lever in the under side of the arm. — Springfield gun, a single-loader with a hinged block, used in the United States army. — To blow great guns (naut.), to blow tempestuously, or with great violence: said of the wind.

Musket-caliber ten-barrel Gatling Gun.

Spanking Jack was so comely, so pleasant, so jolly,
Though winds blew great guns, still he'd whistle and sing.
C. Dibdin, Sailor's Consolation.

To break a gun, to house guns, etc. See the verbs. — Vavasseur gun [named from the inventor of the system], a built-up steel gun with wrought-iron trunnion-band, and having three ribs projecting into the bore to replace the grooves usually employed in rifling. — Vetterli gun [from the inventor, F. Vetterli]. (a) A single-loading small-arm, caliber 0″.408, used in the Italian army. (b) A magazine bolt-gun used in the Italian and Swiss armies. — Whitworth gun, an English rifled firearm, whether great or small, having a hexagonal bore, with a twist more rapid than usual: invented by Sir Joseph Whitworth.—Winchester gun, an American magazine-rifle having a horizontal bolt and vertical cartridge-carrier operated by a lever on the under side of the stock. The magazine is below the barrel and in front of the receiver.—Wire gun, a built-up gun made by winding wire about a tube, or by covering the tube with alternate layers wound circumferentially and laid longitudinally. See Woodbridge gun.—Woodbridge gun, a gun consisting of a thin steel tube wound with square wire, the interstices being filled with melted brazing-solder to consolidate it into one mass.—Woolwich gun, a built-up muzzle-loading cannon used in the British service. The tube is made of solid cast-steel drawn out by heating and hammering. After boring, turning, and chambering, the tube is heated to a uniform temperature and plunged into a covered tank of rape-oil to harden and temper it. Wrought-iron coils are shrunk on over the tube to complete the structure. The breech-coil is formed of a triple coil, a trunnion-ring, and a double coil welded together. The muzzle-coil is composed of two single coils united by an end-weld. The breech-piece is screwed into the breech-coil so as to abut against the rear end of the tube. The gun is assembled by heating the coils, and these when expanded are slipped over the tube and allowed to contract. The tube is kept cool during this operation by forcing a stream of cold water through the bore. These guns have from 7 to 10 grooves semicircular in cross-section, with curved edges and with a uniformly increasing twist. Also called Fraser gun. (See also casemate-gun, dynamite-gun, machine-gun, needle-gun, etc.) gun[1] (gun), v. i.; pret. and pp. gunned, ppr. gunning. [< gun[1], n.] To shoot with a gun; practise shooting, especially the smaller kinds of game. [U. S.]

The Americans were, however, mostly marksmen, having been accustomed to gunning from their youth.
Hannah Adams, Hist. New Eng.

gun[2]†. Past participle of gin[1].

guna (gu'nä), n. [Skt. guṇa, quality, adscititious quality, as distinguished from the real nature.] In Skt. gram., the changing of i and ī to e, u and ū to o, ri and rī to ar, by compounding them with a prefixed a—that is, a + i = e, and so on. The term is also sometimes used in regard to similar changes in other languages.

gunarchy†, n. Same as gynarchy.

gunate (gō'nāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. gunated, ppr. gunating. [< guna + -ate[2].] In philol., to subject to the change known as guna.

gunation (gō-nā'shon), n. [< gunate + -ion.] In philol., the act of gunating, or the state of being gunated.

gun-barrel (gun'bar″el), n. The barrel or tube of a gun.—Gun-barrel drain. See drain.

gunboat (gun'bōt), n. 1. A boat or small vessel fitted to carry one or more guns of large caliber, and from its light draft capable of running close inshore or up rivers; also, any small vessel carrying guns.—2. In coal-mining, a self-dumping box on wheels, used for raising coal on slopes, and holding three or four tons of coal. It resembles a "skip," but runs on wheels, and not between guides. [Pennsylvania anthracite region.]

If they cut one or two of our people's heads off in Africa, we get up a gun-brig, and burn the barracoons, and slaughter a whole village for it.
Lever, Bramleighs of Bishop's Folly, I. 298.

gun-captain (gun'kap″tān), n. The chief of a gun's crew, generally a petty officer.

gun-carriage (gun'kar″āj), n. The carriage or structure on which a gun is mounted or moved, and on which it is fired. Naval gun-carriages formerly consisted of two sides or brackets of wood, mounted on wooden trucks and controlled by tackles; but the requirements of modern gunnery have caused wood to be replaced by brass and iron or steel, and simple tackles by powerful gearing and machinery. In the case of a field- or siege-piece the carriage unites, for traveling, with a fore part fixed on a pair of wheels, called a limber, to which the horses are attached, so as to form a single four-wheeled carriage. In action it is unlimbered or detached from the fore part, and then rests on its wheels and on a strong support called the trail.—Disappearing gun-carriage, a gun-carriage so arranged that the gun after being fired descends, under the influence of the force of recoil, to the loading position behind the protection of the parapet, where it can be manœuvered without exposing the gun detachment to the enemy's fire. During the recoil of the gun sufficient energy is stored up, by means of a counterweight or by air compression, to raise the gun to firing position when released. The Buffington-Crozier disappearing gun-carriage has been adopted for the seacoast service of the United States. The gun is mounted upon levers trunnioned in a top carriage which rolls back under the force of recoil. The lower ends of the levers are compelled to move between vertical guides and raise a counterweight. The constrained motion on two lines approximately perpendicular to each other, thus causing the gun to describe an arc of an ellipse in recoiling, is the mechanical principle of the carriage.

A, stock. B, cheek. a, lunette; b, trail-plate; c, c, pointing-rings; d, handle; e, e, prolonge-hooks; f, wheel-guard plate; g, lock-chain bolt, nut, and washer; h, turn buckle, chain, and hasp for sponge and rammer; i, stop for rammer-head; k, ear-plate for worm; l, elevating-screw; m, under-strap; n, implement-hook; o, D-ring for hand-spike; q, trunnion-plate; r, cap-square; s, s, cap-square chains and keys; 1, prolonge; 2, sponge and rammer; 3, hand-spike.

guncotton (gun'kot″n), n. A general name for the nitrates of cellulose, prepared by digesting cotton or other form of cellulose in nitric acid, or preferably in a mixture of nitric and sulphuric acids. A series of nitrates may thus be made, differing in composition and properties according to the strength of acids and time of digestion. Weak acids and short digestion yield trinitro- and tetranitro-cellulose, which dissolve in a mixture of alcohol and ether. This solution is the collodion of commerce. A highly explosive nitrate, to which the name guncotton more properly belongs, is made by digesting clean cotton in a mixture of 1 part nitric acid, specific gravity 1.5, and 3 parts sulphuric acid, specific gravity 1.85, for 24 hours and thoroughly washing the product. This is a hexanitrate of cellulose, $C_{12}H_{14}(NO_3)_6O_{10}$. It can hardly be distinguished by appearance from raw cotton, and is insoluble in alcohol and ether. When ignited it burns quietly, leaving no residue, but by percussion explodes violently, especially if compressed. Its explosive force is much greater than that of gunpowder. It has been used chiefly for torpedoes and submarine blasting, but is now largely superseded by dynamite.

gun-deck (gun'dek), n. See deck, 2.

gundelet† (gun'de-let), n. A gondola. Marston.

gundelo, gundelow (gun'de-lō), n. [A corruption of gondolo, gondola: see gondola.] Same as gondola, 2.

The square sail of the gundelow.
Whittier, Snow-Bound.

gundi (gön'di), n. [Ar.] The north African comb-rat, Ctenodactylus massoni.

gundie (gun'di), a. [Origin obscure.] Greedy; voracious. [Scotch.]

gundie (gun'di), n. [Cf. gundie, a.] The sea-sculpin, Myoxocephalus scorpius. [Scotch.]

Gundlachia (gund-lak'i-ä), n. [NL., after J. Gundlach, a Cuban naturalist.] A genus of limpet-like fresh-water pond-snails, of the family Limnæidæ, related to Ancylus, living on stones under water and feeding on confervæ and other plants. The body is left-sided, and the genital openings are on the left side.

gun-fire (gun'fīr), n. Milit., the hour at which the morning or evening gun is fired.

gun-flint (gun'flint), n. A piece of shaped flint fixed in the lock of a musket or pistol, before percussion-caps were used, to fire the charge.

gunge, n. See gunj.

gun-gear (gun'gēr), n. All appliances and tools pertaining to the use of guns.

gun-harpoon (gun'här-pön″), n. A toggle-iron discharged from a bomb-gun at a whale, instead of being thrown by hand.

gun-iron (gun'ī ėrn), n. 1. A gun-harpoon.—2. See the extract.

All the iron for gun-work is specially prepared, it is of a superior quality to that to be generally obtained, and is known as gun-iron. W. W. Greener, The Gun, p. 257.

gunj, gunge (gunj), n. [Anglo-Ind., < Hind. Pers. ganj, a granary, mart, etc.] In Bengal, a public granary or store. Imp. Dict.

gunjah (gun'jä), n. Same as ganjah.

gun-lift (gun'lift), n. A machine or trestle surmounted by a hoisting-bar and a hydraulic jack, used for mounting and dismounting heavy guns or moving heavy weights.

gun-lock (gun'lok), n. The mechanism of a gun by which the hammer is controlled both in cocking the piece and in exploding the charge.

Gun-lock.

a, hammer or cock; b, tumbler; c, bridle; d, bridle-screw; e, sear; f, sear-screw; g, sear-spring; h, sear-spring screw; i, main-spring; k, swivel; l, l, side-screws.

gun-maker (gun'mā″kėr), n. A maker of guns or small firearms.

This all important matter will influence the gunmaker.
The Engineer, LXVI. 65.

gunman (gun'man), n.; pl. gunmen (-men). 1. A man employed in the manufacture of firearms.—2. One who is expert with a gun or firearms, or is ready to use his skill with firearms unlawfully for hire.

gun-metal (gun'met″al), n. A bronze formerly much employed for cannon, especially for light field-artillery. It is now nearly supplanted by steel. See bronze.

gun-money (gun'mun″i), n. Money of the coinage issued by James II. in Ireland when he attempted to recover his kingdom in 1689 and 1690. To obtain a sufficient supply of money, James issued coins nominally of the value of 5*s.*, 2*s.* 6*d.*, 1*s.*, and 6*d.*; but they were made of the metal from brass cannon and kitchen utensils of copper and brass.

gunnage (gun'āj), n. [< gun[1] + -age.] The total of the guns carried by a ship of war. [Rare.]

gunne[1]†. Preterit of gin[1].

gunne[2]†, n. A Middle English form of gun[1].

gunnel, n. See gunwale.

gunner (gun'ėr), n. [< ME. gunner, gonner (ML. gunnarius), < gunne, gonne, a gun: see gun[1].] 1†. One who discharged a gun of the catapult kind. See gun[1], n.

Gunnare, or he that swagythe a gunne, petrarius, mangonalius.
Prompt. Parv., p. 219.

2. One skilled in the use of guns or cannon; one who works a gun, either on land or at sea; a cannoneer.

The master gonner of the Englishe parte slewe the master gonner of Scotlande, and bet all his men from theyr ordinaunce. Hall, Hen. VIII., an. 5.

The nimble gunner
With linstock now the devilish cannon touches.
Shak., Hen. V., iii. (cho.).

Flash'd all their sabres bare, . . .
Sabring the gunners there.
Tennyson, Light Brigade.

3. A warrant-officer in the navy appointed to take charge of all the ordnance, ordnance-stores, and ammunition on board ship.—4. One who uses firearms; especially, one who practises the art of shooting game.

We endeavored to glean from intelligent gunners of that region some information relating to the habits, food, migrations, etc., of these birds. Shore Birds, p. 1.

5. The loon or great northern diver. [Local, British.]—6. The sea-bream, Pagellus centrodontus. [Ireland.]—Gunner's mate, a petty officer of a ship appointed to assist the gunner.—Gunner's quadrant, an instrument used for determining the proper elevation for cannon fired at high angles.

Gunnera (gun'ė-rä), n. [NL., named after J. E. Gunnerus, a Norwegian botanist (1718–73).] A small genus of marsh-plants, of the family Halo- ragidaceæ, mostly natives of Africa, South America, Tasmania, and the islands of the Pacific. They have very large radical leaves springing from a stout rootstock, and minute flowers in a crowded spike. G. Chilensis, from Chile, is cultivated.

Gunnera Chilensis.

gunneress (gun'ėr-es), n. [< gunner + -ess.] A woman who acts as gunner.

The seized cannon are yoked with seized cart-horses: brown-locked Demoiselle Théroigne, with pike and helmet, sits there as gunneress.
Carlyle, French Rev., I. vii. 5.

gunner-fluke (gun'ėr-flōk), n. [Sc., also written gunnerfleuk; < gunner (?) + *fluke*², q. v.] The turbot. See *fluke*², 1 (c).

gunnery (gun'ėr-i), n. [< *gun*¹ + -ery.] 1. The use of guns: same as gunning.

Archery is now dispossessed by gunnery: how iustly, let others iudge. Camden, Remains, Artillarie.

Specifically—2. The art and science of firing guns. The science of gunnery has especial reference to atmospheric resistance to projectiles, and their velocity, path, range, and effect, as affected by the form and size of gun and projectile, size and quality of charge, elevation of gun, etc. Abbreviated gun.

From the first rude essays of clubs and stones to the present perfection of gunnery, cannoneering, bombarding, mining, etc. Burke, Vind. of Nat. Society.

gunnery-lieutenant (gun'ėr-i-lū-ten″ant), n. An officer appointed to a ship to supervise the exercise of gunnery and management of the guns. [Eng.]

gunnery-ship (gun'ėr-i-ship), n. A ship specially devoted to the practice of gunnery and experiments with ordnance.

gunney, n. See gunny.

gunnies (gun'iz), n. [Of Corn. origin.] In mining, breadth or width. A single gunnies is a breadth of 3 feet. Also spelled gunniss. [Cornwall, Eng.]

The former vaults or caishés that were dug in a mine are called "the old gunnies." Pryce.

gunning (gun'ing), n. [Verbal n. of *gun*¹, v.] The art or practice of shooting with guns; especially, the sport or pursuit of shooting game.

In the earlier times, the art of gunning was but little practised. Goldsmith.

Gunning for shooting is in Drayton. Lowell, Biglow Papers, Int.

=Syn. Gunning, Hunting, Shooting. In the United States these terms are loosely used as interchangeable; more strictly, gunning and shooting are confined to the pursuit of feathered and small game, and hunting to the pursuit of larger game. In England hunting means chasing foxes or stags with horse and hounds, or hares with beagles.

gunning-boat (gun'ing-bōt), n. A light and narrow boat in which the fenmen pursue flocks of wild fowl along their narrow drains. Also called a gunning-shout. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

gunnisonite (gun'i-son-īt), n. [< Gunnison (see def.) + *-ite*².] A mineral found near Gunnison in Colorado, containing calcium fluoride, silica, alumina, etc., and probably an altered or impure fluorite.

gunniss, n. See gunnies.

gunnung (gun'ung), n. [Australian.] A species of gum-tree, Eucalyptus robusta.

gunny (gun'i), n.; pl. gunnies (-iz). [Also written gunney; Hindi and Mahratti gōn, gōnī, a gunny, a gunny-bag; compare Mahratti, Skt. gōnī, a sack.] A strong coarse sackcloth manufactured chiefly in Bengal from jute, but to some extent also in Bombay and Madras from sunn-hemp. It is used for clothing by many poor people, but principally for bagging and the wrapping of large packages, as cotton-bales, for which use large quantities are exported to the United States. The material is commonly called gunny-cloth, and much of it is made up and exported under the name of gunny-bags. It is also extensively manufactured in Dundee, Scotland.—Gunny of cinnamon, three quarters of a hundredweight.—Gunny of saltpeter, one quarter of a hundredweight.

gunny-bags (gun'i-bagz), n. pl. See gunny.

gun-pendulum (gun'pen″dū-lum), n. 1. A device for determining the strength of gunpowder. It consists of a box filled with sand-bags, suspended so as to swing freely on receiving the impact of a ball fired from a gun or cannon. See ballistic pendulum, under ballistic.

2. A small cannon or musket suspended horizontally in a swinging frame furnished with a fixed arc, properly graduated, and a movable pointer, for ascertaining the angular distance through which the gun oscillates in its recoil. The initial velocity of the projectile is calculated from the value of the arc of recoil. This method is now nearly obsolete.

gun-pit (gun'pit), n. A pit for receiving the mold used in casting a gun, or for receiving the tube or jacket in assembling a built-up gun.

gun-port (gun'pōrt), n. A hole in a ship's side for the muzzle of a cannon; a port-hole for a gun.

gunpowder (gun'pou″dėr), n. [< ME. (AF.) gounepoudre (1422), < goune, gun, + poudre, powder.] An explosive mixture of saltpeter, sulphur, and charcoal, reduced to fine powder, and thoroughly incorporated with each other, then granulated, cleaned or dusted, glazed or polished, and dried. The finished powder is employed for the discharge of projectiles from guns, in blasting, and for other purposes. The proportion of the ingredients in the composition of gunpowder varies in different countries, and with the different uses for which it is designed. The powders used for military purposes are distinguished, according to the fineness and evenness of granulation, as (a) irregular, as musket, mortar, cannon, and mammoth powders; (b) regular, as cubical, pellet, hexagonal, spherohexagonal, and prismatic (perforated hexagonal prisms) powders. These powders may have the same composition, but differ in size and form of grain, density, and method of manufacture. Musket powder is used for small-arms, mortar-powder for field-guns, cannon powder for light siege-guns, and the larger-grained and special powders for heavy sea-coast guns. Mixtures of a nature similar to gunpowder were known in China and India from remote times, and were especially used for rockets. The invention of gunpowder in Europe has been ascribed to Roger Bacon (about 1214–94) and to a German monk named Schwarz (about 1320), but it was probably introduced into Europe through the medium of the Moors early in the fourteenth century. Its common use in warfare dates from the sixteenth century.—Caking gunpowder. See *cake*¹, v. t.—Gravimetric density of gunpowder. See density.—Gunpowder paper, an explosive substance consisting of an explosive mixture spread on paper, dried, and rolled up in the form of a cartridge.—Gunpowder plot, in Eng. hist., a conspiracy to blow up the king (James I.) and the lords and commons in the Parliament House, in 1605, in revenge for the laws against Roman Catholics. The defeat of this plot by its discovery was long celebrated publicly on the 5th of November, and still is to some extent privately, by processions and the burning in effigy of Guy Fawkes, its principal agent, who was executed.—Gunpowder tea, a fine species of green tea, being a carefully picked hyson, the leaves of which are rolled and rounded so as to have a granular appearance.—Smokeless gunpowder, a substitute for gunpowder which gives off little or no smoke when discharged in a gun and develops increased velocity in the projectile without increased pressure in the gun. It consists in general of an oxidizing agent and a substance added to regulate the explosive force. This latter is technically called a deterrent. Smokeless powders are classified according to the oxidizer used: (1) Picric-acid powders; (2) ammonium-nitrate powders (these are highly hygroscopic); (3) guncotton powders; (4) nitroglycerin and guncotton powders. The first two classes have practically been abandoned. Smokeless powders have entirely replaced ordinary gunpowder as a propelling agent in cannon; those so used are chiefly of the third class.—White gunpowder, a blasting-mixture composed of chlorate of potash, dried ferrocyanide of potassium, and sugar. it is now rarely used, owing to its liability to explode during manufacture, transportation, etc.

gunpowder-press (gun'pou-dėr-pres), n. In gunpowder-manuf., a press for compacting mill-cake or dust-powder into hard cakes preparatory to granulating.

gun-reach (gun'rēch), n. Gunshot; the distance a gun will carry. Sydney Smith.

gun-room (gun'röm), n. In the British navy, an apartment on the after part of the lower gun-deck of a man-of-war, devoted to the use of the junior officers.

gun-searcher (gun'sėr″chėr), n. An instrument used to search for defects in the bore of a cannon. As formerly made, it consisted of a staff with one or more projecting prongs. As now constructed, it consists of an arrangement of mirrors with a telescope. Light being reflected into all parts of the bore, it is carefully examined for defects with the telescope. Also called bore-searcher.

gunshot (gun'shot), n. and a. I. n. 1†. Collectively, projectiles for cannon; solid shot.

An Albanese fled to the enemies campe, and warned them not to go, for the gunshot was nigh wasted. Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 85.

2. The reach or range of a gun; the distance to which shot can be thrown from a cannon so as to be effective; milit., the length of the pointblank range of a cannon-shot.—3. In her., a roundel sable.—4†. The firing of a cannon.

And fill Heauen and Earth with shouting, singing, hallowing, gun-shot and fire-workes all that night. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 269.

II. a. Made by the shot of a gun: as, a gun-shot wound.

gun-shy (gun'shī), a. Afraid of a gun; frightened by the report of a gun: said of a field-dog.

gun-shyness (gun'shī″nes), n. The state of being gun-shy.

gun-slide (gun'slīd), n. In naval gun., the chassis on which the top-carriage carrying the gun slides in recoiling.

gun-sling (gun'sling), n. 1. A sling for lifting a gun off its carriage, or off the ground when placed under a gin or other lifting-machine.—2. A kind of strap or sling for carrying a shot-gun or rifle; specifically, a leather loop or sling which buttons or buckles on the pommel of a saddle, and in which a shot-gun or rifle is so slung that it is carried across the lap of the rider. Gun-slings of this kind are in general use in the western United States, especially with the Mexican or Spanish saddle, and some modification of them is adapted to the regulation McClellan saddle used in the United States army.

gunsmith (gun'smith), n. A maker of small-arms; one whose occupation is to make or repair small firearms.

gunsmithery (gun'smith″ėr-i), n. [< gunsmith + -ery.] The business of a gunsmith; the art of making small firearms; also, a place where the business of a gunsmith is carried on.

gunster (gun'stėr), n. [< *gun*¹ + -ster; a humorous word, coined with allusion to punster.] One who uses a gun. Tatler. [Rare.]

gun-stick (gun'stik), n. A rammer or ramrod; a stick or rod used to ram down the charge of a musket, etc.

gun-stock (gun'stok), n. The stock or wooden support in which the barrel of a gun is fixed.

Gun-stock.

a, butt; b, comb; c, grip, or small of the stock; d, head; e, shoulder for lower band; f, shoulder for upper band; h, grasping-groove; i, bed for band-spring; k, drop; l, heel; m, toe.

gun-stocker (gun'stok″ėr), n. One who fits the stocks of guns to the barrels.

gun-stocking (gun'stok″ing), n. The operation of fitting the stocks of guns to the barrels.

gunstone† (gun'stōn), n. 1. A stone used for the shot of a catapult or cannon. Before the invention of iron balls, stones were commonly used as projectiles.

And tell the pleasant prince, this mock of his Hath turn'd his balls to gun-stones.
Shak., Hen. V., i. 2.

That I could shoot mine eyes at him like gunstones.
B. Jonson, Volpone, v. 5.

2. A flint prepared for insertion in the lock of a gun. See flint-lock.

gun-tackle (gun'tak″l), n. 1. pl. The purchases fixed to a gun-carriage, and used to run a gun in or out of a port-hole. Side tackles are on the side of the carriage, and are used to run the gun out. Train tackles are on the rear end of the carriage, and are used to run the gun in.

2. A tackle composed of a fall and two single blocks: called specifically a gun-tackle purchase.

Gunter rig. See rig.

Gunter's chain, line, quadrant, proportion, scale, etc. See the nouns.

gun-wad (gun'wod), n. A wad for a gun; specifically, a circular wad, cut with an implement known as a wad-cutter out of pasteboard, cardboard, or felt, used as wadding to keep the ammunition in place either in a gun-barrel or in a paper or metal shell. For shot-guns the wads used over the shot are generally simple pieces of pasteboard; those placed over the powder are usually made of thick elastic felt, and have the edge all around treated with some substance which tends to keep the barrels from fouling. See wad.

gun-wadding (gun'wod″ing), n. The material of which gun-wads are made.

gunwale, gunnel (gun'wāl, gun'l), n. [Prop. gunwale, corrupted in sailors' pronunciation to gunnel, formerly also gunnal (cf. trunnel); so called because the upper guns used to be pointed from it; < *gun*¹ + wale, a plank, the upper edge of a ship's side, next the bulwarks: see *gun*¹ and *wale*¹.] Naut., the upper edge of a ship's side; the uppermost wale of a ship, or that piece of timber which reaches on either side from the quarter-deck to the forecastle, being the uppermost bend which finishes the upper works of the hull. The gunwale of a boat is a piece of timber going round the upper sheer strake as a binder for its top-work.

G, G, gunwale; K, keel; T, thwart.

The first rope going athwart from gunnal to gunnal . . . bind the boats so hard against the end of the benches that they cannot easily fall asunder. Dampier, Voyages, an. 1690.

On board the ships, mitrailleuses and field-pieces were mounted on the gunnels. Hobart Pasha, N. A. Rev., CXXVII. 384.

gun-work (gun'wėrk), n. 1. Any machine-labor or manual labor employed in the production of ordnance.—2. The labor of inspecting or designing ordnance, or of making calculations or reports upon ordnance or ordnance subjects: as, an officer detailed upon gun-work exclusively.

gup (gup), n. [Hind. gap, gapshap, prattle, tattle, gossip.] In India and the East, gossip; tattle; scandal.

gurfel (gėr'fel), n. [Appar. a var. of Faroese goirfugel, ult. of E. garefowl.] The razor-billed auk. C. Swainson. [Prov. Eng.]

gurge† (gėrj), n. [< L. gurges, a whirlpool: see gorge.] A whirlpool.

> Marching from Eden, . . . [he] shall find
> The plain, wherein a black bituminous gurge
> Boils out from under ground. Milton, P. L., xii. 41.
>
> Sanguine, feverous, boiling gurge of pulse.
> Keats, Hyperion, ii.

gurge† (gėrj), v. t. [< gurge, n. Cf. gorge, v.] To swirl or surge, like a whirlpool.

> In gurging gulfe of these such surging seas,
> My poorer soule who drown'd doth death request.
> Mir. for Mags., p. 227.

gurgeons† (gėr'jonz), n. pl. See grudgings.

gurges (gėr'jēz), n. [L., a whirlpool: see gurge, gorge.] In her., a spiral of two narrow bands argent and azure, supposed to represent a whirlpool. It generally occupies the whole field.

gurgitation (gėr-ji-tā'shon), n. [< L. gurgitare, engulf, flood, < gurges (gurgit-), a raging abyss, whirlpool: see gorge. Cf. regurgitation.] Surging rise and fall; ebullient motion, as of boiling water.

> The whole eruption did not last longer than about five minutes, after which the water sank in the funnel and the same restless gurgitation was resumed.
> Geikie, Geol. Sketches, ii. 19.

gurgle (gėr'gl), v.; pret. and pp. gurgled, ppr. gurgling. [Cf. Pg. gurgulhar, gush out, boil fast, bubble, = It. gorgogliare, gargle, bubble up, gurgle (gorgoglio, a gargling, gurgling, purling); cf. also D. gorgelen = MLG. gorgelen, gargle, = G. gurgeln, refl. gargle, intr. rattle in the throat; Sw. gurgla = Dan. gurgle, gargle: verbs associated with the noun, D. gorgel = OHG. gurgula, MHG. G. gurgel, throat, gargle, < L. gurgulio, the throat (see gargle[1], gargoyle), but in part regarded, like the dial. var. guggle and gargle[1], as imitative of the sound of water in a broken, irregular flow.] I. intrans. 1. To run or flow in a broken, irregular, noisy current, as water from a bottle, or a small stream on a stony bottom; flow with a purling sound.

> Pure gurgling rills the lonely desert trace. Young.
> Where twice a day
> Gurgled the waters of the moon-struck sea.
> Whittier, Bridal of Pennacook, v.

2. To make a sound like that of gurgling liquid.

> Louder then will be the song:
> For she will plain, and gurgle, as she goes,
> As does the widow'd ring-dove.
> W. Mason, English Garden, iii.

> A thrush in the old orchard down in the hollow, out of sight, whistled and gurgled with continual shrill melody.
> Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, xxxiii.

> Far into the night the soft dip of the oar, and the gurgling progress of the boats, was company and gentlest lullaby. Howells, Venetian Life, viii.

II. trans. To utter or produce with a gurgling sound.

> Even here would malice leer its last,
> Gurgle its choked remonstrance.
> Browning, Ring and Book, II. 162.

gurgle (gėr'gl), n. [< gurgle, v.] A gurgling gush or flow of liquid; the sound made by a liquid flowing from the narrow mouth of a vessel, or through any narrow opening; a purling sound, as of a small stream flowing over a stony bottom; or the sound made when air is forced through a liquid.

> Flow, flow, thou crystal rill,
> With tinkling gurgles fill
> The mazes of the grove.
> Thompson, The Bower.

> He ought to hear the gurgle of a drowning prisoner, flung down into that darkness by us, his executioners.
> T. Winthrop, Cecil Dreeme, x.

gurglet (gėr'glet), n. [< gurgle + -et. Cf. guggle.] A very porous earthen vessel for cooling water by evaporation.

> A sponge and a small gurglet of water.
> L. Wallace, Ben-Hur, p. 10.

Gut-spinning is the twisting of prepared gut into cord of various diameter for various purposes—i. e., for ordinary catgut, for use in machinery, and for fiddle-strings.
Workshop Receipts, 2d ser., p. 319.

4. A preparation of the intestines of an animal used for various purposes, as for the strings of a violin, or, in angling, for the snood or leader to which the hook or lure is attached. In the latter case the material, called in full silkworm gut, is not true gut, but is formed from the fiber drawn out from a silkworm killed when it is just ready to spin its cocoon.

5. A narrow passage; particularly, a narrow channel of water; a strait; a long narrow inlet.

North of it, in a gut of the hill, was the Fish-pool of Siloe. Sandys, Travailes, p. 146.

We . . . looked down upon the straggling village of Port Hawksbury and the winding Gut of Canso.
C. D. Warner, Baddeck, v.

Branchial gut. See branchial.—Fore-gut, in anat., the anterior section of the primitive alimentary canal in vertebrate embryos. From it are developed the pharynx, esophagus, stomach, and duodenum.—Hind-gut, in anat., the posterior part of the primitive alimentary canal, giving origin to parts of the intestine in the neighborhood of the anus, but extending from that point backward in a subcaudal or postanal prolongation. See epigaster.—Mid-gut, in anat., the middle part of the primitive alimentary canal, from which is developed the greater part of the intestine.—To have guts in the brains†, to have sense. Davies. [Low.]

Quoth Ralpho, "Truly that is no Hard matter for a man to do
That has but any guts in 's brains."
S. Butler, Hudibras, I. iii. 1091.

The fellow's well enough, if he had any guts in his brains. Swift, Polite Conversation, i.

gut (gut), v. t.; pret. and pp. gutted, ppr. gutting. [< ME. gutten; from the noun.] 1. To take out the entrails of; disembowel; eviscerate.

The fishermen save the most part of their fish: some are gutted, splitted, powdered, and dried.
R. Carew, Survey of Cornwall.

2. To plunder of contents; destroy or strip the interior of: as, the burglars gutted the store.

In half an hour the lately splendid residence of the proprietor of the greatest private banking-house in London was gutted from cellar to ridge-pole.
J. Hawthorne, Dust, p. 311.

gut-formed (gut'fôrmd), a. Formed like a gut. The term is applied by Darwin to two glands which lie one on each side of the stomach of cirripeds: considered by Huxley as probably accessory glands of the reproductive organs, analogous to those which secrete the walls of the ovisac in copepods. See second cut under Balanus.

Gutierrezia (gö-ti-er-ez'i-ä), n. [NL., < Gutierrez, the name of a noble Spanish family.] A genus of asteroid composites, of the western United States, Mexico, and extratropical South America. They are low, glabrous, and often glutinous herbs or suffrutescent plants, with linear leaves and small heads of yellow flowers. Of the 20 species, 11 are found in the United States.

gut-length (gut'length), n. A length of silkworm gut, usually, as imported into the United States, from 12 to 15 inches, employed for leaders and snells by anglers. See gut, 4.

gutling†, n. [< gut + -ling[1].] A glutton.

The poets wanted no sport the while, who made themselves bitterly merry with descanting upon the lean skulls and the fat paunches of these lazy gutlings.
Bp. Sanderson, Works, III. 106.

gut-scraper (gut'skrā″pėr), n. A scraper of catgut; a fiddle-player. [Contemptuous.]

gutta[1] (gut'ä), n.; pl. guttæ (-ē). [L., a drop: see gout[1].] 1. A drop; specifically, in arch., one of a series of pendent ornaments, generally in the form of the frustum of a cone, but sometimes cylindrical, attached to the under side of the mutules and regulæ of the Doric entablature. They probably represent wooden pegs or treenails which occupied these positions in primitive wooden constructions. Also called trunnel.

Guttæ in Doric Architecture.
A, form of gutta beneath regula; G, G, guttæ beneath mutules and regulæ.

2. In phar., a drop: usually, and in prescriptions, written gt., plural gtt.—3. In zoöl., a small spot, generally of a round or oval form, and not differing much in shade from the ground-color, as if made by a drop of water; any small color-spot, especially when guttiform.—Gum guttæ. Same as gamboge.—Gutta serena, an old medical name for amaurosis.

gutta[2] (gut'ä), n. [= F. gutte; < Malay gatah, gutah, guttah, gum, balsam.] Same as gutta-percha.

gutta-percha (gut'ä-pėr'chä), n. [< Malay getah percha, 'gum of the percha tree': getah (also written guttah, gutah, etc.), gum, balsam; percha, the name of the tree producing this gum, or rather of one of the species, the Malay name of Palaquium Gutta being taban (also written tuban, etc.). Cf. Pulo or Pulau percha, a former name of Sumatra, lit. the island of the percha-tree.] The concrete juice of an evergreen sapotaceous tree, Palaquium Gutta, common in the jungles of the Malay peninsula and archipelago. It is a grayish or yellowish inodorous and tasteless substance, nearly inelastic, at ordinary temperatures hard, tough, and somewhat horny, and flexible only in thin plates. At 120° to 140° F. it is sufficiently soft to be rolled into plates, and it becomes very soft at the temperature of boiling water. It is soluble in boiling ether, chloroform, benzol, coal-tar oils, bisulphid of carbon, and oil of turpentine, and with caoutchouc it is readily vulcanized. Gutta-percha is used for a great variety of purposes, as for insulating electric wires, in the manufacture of cord, belting, and other flexible goods, as a substitute for leather, in mastics and cements, for splints and various surgical implements, etc. A similar product is obtained from other species of Palaquium and of several allied genera. Also gutta-taban.

gutta-putih (gut'ä-pö'ti), n. [Malay.] A gum obtained from Payena Leerii, whiter and more spongy than gutta-percha. Also called gutta-sundek.

guttarama (gut-a-rä'mä), n. [S. Amer.] The violet organist, Euphonia violacea, a South American tanager.

gutta-rambong (gut'ä-ram'bong), n. [Malay.] A reddish-brown gum closely resembling caoutchouc, probably obtained from the roots of Ficus elastica.

gutta-shea (gut'ä-shē'ä), n. [Malay.] A hydrocarbon obtained from shea-butter in the manufacture of soap. The milky juice of Butyrospermum Parkii, the fruit of which yields shea-butter, is said to have when dried all the properties of gutta-percha.

gutta-singgarip (gut'ä-sing'ga-rip), n. [Malay.] A soft and spongy gum obtained from Ancylocladus firmus, an apocynaceous Malayan climber, called munungan-poulo.

gutta-sundek (gut'ä-sun'dek), n. [Malay.] Same as gutta-putih.

gutta-taban (gut'ä-tä'ban), n. [Malay.] Same as gutta-percha.

guttate (gut'āt), a. [< L. guttatus, < gutta, a drop: see gutta[1].] 1. Containing drops or drop-like masses, either solid or more or less liquid, often resembling nuclei.—2. In bot., spotted, as if by drops of something colored.—3. In zoöl., having drop-shaped or guttiform spots.

guttated (gut'ā-ted), a. [< L. gutta, a drop.] Same as guttate.

guttation (gu-tā'shọn), n. [< guttate + -ion.] The act of dropping or of flowing in drops.

gutta-trap (gut'ä-trap), n. The inspissated juice of the Artocarpus incisa, or eastern bread-fruit-tree, used for its glutinous properties in making bird-lime.

gutté, gutty (gut'ā, -i), a. [< OF. gouté, goté, spotted, < L. guttatus, spotted, guttate: see guttate.] In her., covered with representations of drops of liquid: an epithet always used with words explaining the tincture of the drops.—Gutté reversed, in her., charged with drops like those of gutté, with the bulb or globe of the drop upward.

gutted (gut'ed), a. 1. Having entrails.—2. Having the entrails removed; disemboweled: as, gutted herring.

gutter[1] (gut'ėr), n. [< ME. gotere, < OF. gutiere, goutiere, F. gouttière, f. (OF. also goutier, gouttier, m.) (= Pr. Sp. gotera = Pg. goteira, f.), a gutter, orig. a channel for receiving the drippings from the roof, < OF. gote, goute, F. goutte = Pr. Sp. Pg. gota, a drop, < L. gutta, a drop: see gout[1].] 1. A narrow channel at the eaves or on the roof of a building, at the sides of a road or a street, or elsewhere, for carrying off water or other fluid; a conduit; a trough.

Lete make goeteres in to the diches.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), i. 38.

He digged out a gutter to receiue the wine when it wer pressed, and he sette furthermore a wyne presse in it.
J. Udall, On Luke xx.

O can my frozen gutters choose but run
That feel the warmth of such a glorious sun?
Quarles, Emblems, v. 5.

Like a river down the gutter roars
The rain, the welcome rain!
Longfellow, Rain in Summer.

2. A furrow; especially, a furrow made by the action of water.

Rocks rise one above another, and have deep gutters worn in the sides of them by torrents of rain.
Addison, Travels in Italy.

3†. A passageway; a secret passage.

This Troylus, right platly for to seyn,
Is thorgh a goter, by a privy wente,
Into my chaumber com in al this reyn.
Chaucer, Troilus, iii. 787.

4. pl. Mud; mire; dirt. [Scotch.]—5. In Australian gold-mining, the lower auriferous part of the channel of an old river of the Tertiary age, now often deeply covered by volcanic materials and detrital deposits.—6. In printing, one of a number of pieces of wood or metal, channeled in the center with a groove or gutter, used to separate the pages of type in a form. Also gutter-stick.—7. In entom., any groove or elongate depression, especially when it serves as a receptacle for a part or an organ; specifically, a fold or deflexed and incurved space on the posterior wing of a lepidopterous insect, adjoining the inner edge, and embracing the abdomen from above downward when the wings are at rest.—8. In cabinet-work, etc., a slight depression. Flutings and godroons are always in series; the term gutter is used rather for a single depression or one of two or three.

gutter[1] (gut'ėr), v. [< gutter[1], n.] I. trans. 1. To furrow, groove, or channel, as by the flow of a liquid.

My cheeks are guttered with my fretting tears. Sandys.

As irrelevant to the daylight as a last night's guttered candle. George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, i. 8.

2. To conduct off, as by a trough or gutter.

Transplantyng hem is best atte yeres two.
So gutterynge the water from hem shelve.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 217.

3. To provide with gutters: as, to gutter a house.

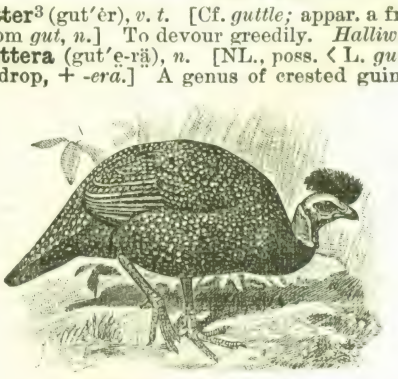
II. intrans. 1. To become channeled by the flow of melted tallow or wax, as a burning candle.—2. To let fall drops, as of melted tallow from a candle.



The discourse was cut short by the sudden appearance of Charley on the scene with a face and hands of hideous blackness, and a nose guttering like a candle.
T. Hardy, Under the Greenwood Tree, vii.

gutter[2] (gut'ėr), n. [< gut + -er[1].] One who guts fish in dressing them.

When we drew near we found they were but the fish curers' gutters and packers at work.
Harper's Mag., LXXVII. 950.

gutter[3] (gut'ėr), v. t. [Cf. guttle; appar. a freq. from gut, n.] To devour greedily. Halliwell.

Guttera (gut'e-rä), n. [NL., poss. < L. gutta, a drop, + -era.] A genus of crested guinea-fowls. The type is G. cristata; there are several other species. Wagler, 1832.

Crested Guinea-fowl (Guttera cristata).

gutter-blood (gut'ėr-blud), n. A base-born person; one sprung from the lowest ranks of society. [Rare.]

In rushed a thorough Edinburgh gutter-blood, a ragged rascal, every dud upon whose back was bidding good-day to the other. Scott, Fortunes of Nigel, v.

gutter-boarding (gut'ėr-bōr″ding), n. Same as layer-board.

gutter-cock (gut'ėr-kok), n. The water-rail, Rallus aquaticus. [Cornwall, Eng.]

guttula (gut′ū-lä), n.; pl. guttulæ (-lē). [L., dim. of gutta, a drop.] A small drop; specifically, in entom., a small gutta or spot of color.

guttulate (gut′ū-lāt), a. [< guttula + -ate[1].] 1. Composed of small round vesicles.—2. In bot., containing fine drops, or drop-like particles; minutely guttate.

guttulous† (gut′ū-lus), a. [< guttula + -ous.] In the form of small drops.

It [ice] is plain upon the surface of the water, but round in hail, which is also a glaciation, and figured in its guttulous descent from the air. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 1.

guttur (gut′ėr), n.; pl. guttura (gut′u-rä). [L., the throat. Hence ult. goiter.] 1. The throat. [Rare.]

The letters which we commonly call gutturals, k, g, have nothing to do with the guttur, but with the root of the tongue and the soft palate.
Max Müller, Sci. of Lang., 2d ser., p. 164.

2. In ornith., the whole throat or front of the neck of a bird, including gula and jugulum: opposed to cervix, or the back of the neck.

The front of the neck has been needlessly subdivided. . . . Guttur is a term sometimes used to include gula and jugulum together; it is simply equivalent to "throat."
Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 96.

guttural (gut′u-ral), a. and n. [= F. guttural = Sp. gutural = Pg. guttural = It. gutturale, < NL. gutturalis, < L. guttur, the throat: see guttur.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the throat; formed in or as in the throat: as, the guttural (superior thyroid) artery; a guttural sound; guttural speech.

The harsh guttural Indian language, in the fervent alembic of his loving study, was melted into a written dialect. H. B. Stowe, Oldtown, p. 3.

The guttural character of Spanish is quite alien to the genius of Italian speech.
G. P. Lathrop, Spanish Vistas, p. 194.

Guttural fossa. See fossa[1].

II. n. A sound or combination of sounds pronounced in the throat, or in the back part of the mouth toward the throat, as k; any guttural sound or utterance. In the English alphabet the so-called gutturals are k (written with k, c hard, q, and sometimes ch), g, and ng. They are also called back palatals, or palatals simply, since the name guttural implies a false description, as if the sounds were actually made in the guttur or throat. The same name is given to similar sounds of other languages, also to rough or rasping sounds, as the German ch.

Many words which are soft and musical in the mouth of a Persian may appear very harsh to our eyes, with a number of consonants and gutturals.
Sir W. Jones, Eastern Poetry, i.

Carteret dismayed his colleagues by the volubility with which he addressed his Majesty in German. They listened with envy and terror to the mysterious gutturals which might possibly convey suggestions very little in unison with their wishes. Macaulay, Walpole's Letters.

gutturality (gut-u-ral′i-ti), n. [< guttural + -ity.] The quality of being guttural; gutturalness. [Rare.]

gutturalness (gut′u-ral-nes), n. The quality of being guttural.

gutturine† (gut′u-rin), a. [< L. guttur, the throat, + -ine[1].] Pertaining to the throat.

The bronchocele or gutturine tumour.
Ray, The Deluge, ii. (Latham.)

gutturize (gut′u-rīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. gutturized, ppr. gutturizing. [< guttur + -ize.] To form in the throat, as a sound.

For which the Germans gutturize a sound. Coleridge.

gutty, a. See gutté.

gutwort (gut′wėrt), n. A garden-plant, Globularia Alypum, a violent purgative, found in southern Europe.

guy[1] (gī), v. t. [Early mod. E. also guie; < ME. guyen, gyen, gien, < OF. guier, orig. and later guider = Pr. guiar, guidar = Sp. Pg. guiar = It. guidare, guide; of Teut. origin: see guide. The particular mech. sense (def. 2) is modern.] 1†. To guide.

[He] made William here wardeyn as he wel miȝt, to gye & to gouerne the gay yong kniȝtes.
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 1105.

Gyffe us grace to gye, and governe us here,
In this wrechyd werld, thorowe vertous lywynge.
Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), l. 4.

O lord, my soule and eek my body gye
Unwemmed, lest that I confounded be.
Chaucer, Second Nun's Tale, l. 136.

So of my schip guyed is the rothir,
That y ne may erre for wawe ne for wynde.
Lydgate, MS. Soc. Antiq., 134, f. 1. (Halliwell.)

A writhen staff his steps unstable guies,
Which serv'd his feeble members to uphold.
Fairfax, tr. of Tasso, x. 9.

2. In nautical and mechanical use, to keep in place, steady, or direct by means of a guy.

As the Japanese have no bridge on the nose worth speaking of, the ponderous optical helps must be guyed in by cables of twine slung round the ears.
Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 711.

★guy[1] (gī), n. [< OF. guye, guie, a guide, a crane or derrick, = Sp. guía, a guide, etc., a small rope used on board ship to keep weighty things in their places; from the verb: see guy[1], v., and cf. guide, n.] A rope or other appliance used to steady something. Especially—(a) A rope attached to an object which is being hoisted or lowered, to steady it. (b) A rope which trims or steadies a boom, spar, or yard in a ship. (c) A rope or rod, generally a wire rope, attached to any stationary object to keep it steady or prevent oscillation, as the rods which are attached to a suspension-bridge and to the land on each side, or the stay-rope of a derrick.—Lazy guy (naut.), a guy to keep the boom of a fore-and-aft sail from jibing.

guy[2] (gī), n. [Short for Guy Fawkes: see def. 1.] 1. A grotesque effigy intended to represent Guy Fawkes, the chief conspirator in the gunpowder plot. Such an effigy was formerly burned annually in England, on the 5th of November, the anniversary of the discovery of the gunpowder plot. See gunpowder plot, under gunpowder.

Once on a fifth of November I found a Guy trusted to take care of himself there, while his proprietors had gone to dinner. Dickens, Uncommercial Traveller, xxi.

Hence—2. A person grotesque in dress, looks, or manners; a dowdy; a "fright."

"What extreme guys those artistic fellows usually are!" said young Clintock to Gwendolen. "Do look at the figure he cuts." George Eliot, Daniel Deronda, x.

guy[2] (gī), v. t. [< guy[2], n.] To treat as a guy; jeer at or make fun of; ridicule.

Passes through the streets of Paris, and is guyed by some of those who see him go by. The American, VII. 21.

guydon†, n. See guidon.

guyle†, v. t. An obsolete spelling of guile[1].

guy-rope (gī′rōp), n. A rope used to steady a spar, purchase, etc.; a guy.

guze (gūz), n. [A corruption of gules?] In her., a roundel, murrey or sanguine.

guzzie, n. See guzzy.

guzzle (guz′l), v.; pret. and pp. guzzled, ppr. guzzling. [Perhaps < OF. gouziller*, in comp. desgouziller, gulp down, swallow; this is perhaps connected with F. gosier, the throat. Cf. Lorraine gosse, the throat, the stomach of fatted animals, It. gozzo, the throat, the crop of a bird. Prob. not connected etymologically with guddle[1] or guttle.] I. intrans. To swallow liquor greedily; swill; drink much; drink frequently.

Well-seasoned bowls the gossip's spirit raise,
Who, while she guzzles, chats the doctor's praise.
Roscommon, On Translated Verse.

They [the lackeys] . . . guzzled, devoured, debauched, cheated. Thackeray.

Troth, sir, my master and Sir Gosling are guzzling; they are dabbling together fathom deep.
Dekker and Webster, Westward Ho, v. 1.

II. trans. To swallow often or much of; swallow greedily.

The Pylian king
Was longest liv'd of any two-legg'd thing, Still guzzling must of wine. Dryden.

guzzle (guz′l), n. and a. [< guzzle, v.] I. n. 1. An insatiable thing or person. [Rare.]

That senseless, sensual epicure,
That sink of filth, that guzzle most impure.
Marston, Scourge of Villanie, iii. 7.

2. Drink; intoxicating liquor.

Seal'd Winchesters of threepenny guzzle.
Tom Brown, Works, II. 180.

3. A drinking-bout; a debauch.—4. A drain or ditch; sometimes, a small stream. Also called a guzzen. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

This is all one thing as if hee should goe about to jussle her into some filthy stinking guzzle or ditch.
W. Whately, Bride Bush (1623), p. 114.

II.† a. Filthy; sensual.

Quake, guzzel dogs, that live on putrid slime.
Marston, Scourge of Villanie, Prol.

gyalectiform (jī-a-lek′ti-fôrm), a. [< Gyalecta + L. forma, shape.] Same as gyalectine.

gyalectine (jī-a-lek′tin), a. [< Gyalecta + -ine[1].] Belonging to, resembling, or having the characters of the genus Gyalecta; having urceolate, waxy apothecia.

gyalectoid (jī-a-lek′-toid), a. [< Gyalecta + Gr. εἶδος, form.] Same as gyalectine.

Gyascutus planicosta.

gyascutus (jī-as-kū′-tus), n. [An invented name, simulating a scientific (NL.) form.] 1. An imaginary animal, said to be of tremendous size, and to have both legs on one side of the body much shorter than those on the other, so as to be able to keep its balance in feeding on the side of a very steep mountain.—2. [cap.] [NL.] A genus of buprestid beetles, of western North America, having the mentum rounded in front and the first joint of the hind tarsi elongated. J. L. Le Conte, 1859. See cut on preceding page.

gybe[1]† (jīb), v. and n. An obsolete spelling of gibe[1].

gybe[2]† (jīb), v. An obsolete spelling of jibe[1].

gye†, v. t. An obsolete spelling of guy[1].

gyeld†, n. A bad spelling of gild[2]. Spenser.

Gygis (jī'jis), n. [NL., < Gr. γύγης, a waterbird.] A notable genus of small terns, of the subfamily Sterninæ. They are pure white in color, and have a peculiarly shaped black bill, extremely long pointed wings, and a slightly forked tail. The white sea-swallow, G. alba, of southern seas, is an example. Wagler, 1832.

gymkhana (jim-kä'nä), n. [Anglo-Indian: "a factitious word, invented, we believe, in the Bombay Presidency, and probably based upon gend-khāna ('ball-house'), the name usually given in Hindu to an English racket-court." Yule and Burnell.] A building or grounds provided with facilities for athletic sports; also, a meeting at which such sports are held.

gymnall†, n. A corrupt form of gimmal.

gymnanthous (jim-nan'thus), a. [< NL. gymnanthus*, < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + ἄνθος, flower.] In bot., having naked flowers, from which both calyx and corolla are wanting.

Gymnarchidæ (jim-när'ki-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Gymnarchus + -idæ.] A family of teleostean fishes, represented by the genus Gymnarchus, belonging to the order Scyphophori. The body and tail are scaly and the head scaleless; the margin of the upper jaw is formed in the middle by the intermaxillaries, which coalesce in adult life, and laterally by the maxillaries; the dorsal fin is nearly as long as the back; the tail is tapering, isocercal, and finless, and there are no anal or ventral fins.

Gymnarchus (jim-när'kus), n. [NL., named in ref. to the absence of anal fins, < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + ἀρχός, rectum.] A Cuvierian genus of fishes, the type of the family Gymnarchidæ. G. niloticus, the only species, inhabits tropical African rivers, attaining a length of 6 feet.

gymnasia, n. Latin plural of gymnasium.

gymnasial (jim-nā'zi-ạl), a. [< gymnasi-um + -al.] Of or pertaining to a gymnasium or classical school; hence, as applied to schools and education, classical as opposed to technical: as, gymnasial teachers; a gymnasial plan of study.

The gymnasial education of the youth of Germany, like the constitution of the army, exerts an enormous influence on German life. Pop. Sci. Mo., XIII. 530.

gymnasiarch (jim-nā'zi-ärk), n. [= F. gymnasiarque = Sp. gimnasiarca = Pg. gymnasiarca = It. ginnasiarca, head of an academy, < L. gymnasiarchus, also gymnasiarcha, < Gr. γυμνασίαρχος, γυμνασιάρχης, < γυμνάσιον, gymnasium, + ἄρχειν, rule.] In Gr. hist., a magistrate who superintended the gymnasia and certain public games. In Athens the office was obligatory on the richer citizens, involving the maintenance of persons training for the games at the incumbent's expense.

gymnasiast (jim-nā'zi-ast), n. [< gymnasi-um + -ast.] One who studies or has been educated at a gymnasium or classical school, as opposed to one who has attended a technical school.

The men who have made Germany great in science, in philosophy, . . . have been as a rule gymnasiasts. The American, VI. 214.

gymnasic (jim-nas'ik), a. [< gymnas-ium + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a gymnasium or classical school; gymnasial. [Rare.]

gymnasium (jim-nā'zi-um), n.; pl. gymnasia, gymnasiums (-ạ, -umz). [= F. gymnase = Sp. gimnasio = Pg. gymnasio = It. ginnasio, < L. gymnasium, < Gr. γυμνάσιον, a public place where athletic exercises were practised, < γυμνάζειν, train naked, train in athletic exercises, < γυμνός, naked, stripped, lightly clad.] 1. In Gr. antiq., a public place for instruction in and the practice of athletic exercises: a feature of all Greek communities. It was at first merely an open space of ground, but was later elaborated into an extensive establishment, with porticos, courts, chambers, baths, etc., lavishly decorated with works of art; and facilities for the instruction of the mind, as libraries and lecture-rooms, were often combined with it. The gymnasium was distinctively a Greek institution, and never found high favor in Rome, though introduced by some admirers of the Greeks under the late republic and the empire.

Hence—2. In modern use, a place where or a building in which athletic exercises are taught and performed.

It [Moorfields] was likewise the great gymnasium of our Capital, the resort of wrestlers, boxers, runners, and football players, and the scene of every manly recreation. Pennant, London, p. 346.

3. A school or seminary for the higher branches of literature and science; a school preparatory to the universities, especially in Germany; a classical as opposed to a technical school.

gymnast (jim'nast), n. [< Gr. γυμναστής, a trainer of professional athletes, < γυμνάζειν, train in athletic exercises: see gymnasium.] One who is skilled in athletic exercises; one who is expert in or is a teacher of gymnastics.

gymnastic (jim-nas'tik), a. and n. [= D. gymnastiek = G. Dan. Sw. gymnastik, n., = F. gymnastique, a. and n., = Sp. gimnástico, a., gimnástica, n., = Pg. gymnastico, a., gymnastica, n., = It. ginnastico, a., ginnastica, n., < L. gymnasticus, < Gr. γυμναστικός, pertaining to athletic exercises (fem. γυμναστική, gymnastics), < γυμνάζειν, train in athletic exercises: see gymnast, gymnasium.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to athletic exercises of the body, intended for health, defense, or diversion.

The funeral [of Calanus] was followed, according to ancient Greek usage, by a horse-race, and by gymnastic and musical contests. Bp. Thirlwall, Hist. Greece, lv.

The long course of gymnastic training, without which the final agonistic triumph could not have been attained, was regarded in antiquity as an essential part of the education of every free man, a duty which he owed his country. C. T. Newton, Art and Archæol., p. 323.

2. Pertaining to disciplinary exercises for the intellect.—3. Athletic; vigorous. [Rare.]

To secure
A form, not now gymnastic as of yore,
From rickets and distortion.
Cowper, Task, ii. 591.

II. n. 1. Athletic exercise; athletics.—2. Disciplinary exercise for the intellect or character.

These uses of geometry [accuracy of observation and definiteness of imagination] have been strangely neglected by both friends and foes of this intellectual gymnastic. T. Hill, True Order of Studies, p. 28.

Before he [the student] can choose and preserve a fitting key of words, he should long have practised the literary scales; and it is only after years of such gymnastic that he can sit down at last, legions of words swarming to his call, dozens of turns of phrase simultaneously bidding for his choice. R. L. Stevenson, A College Magazine, i.

3. A teacher of gymnastics; a gymnast. [Rare.]

gymnastical (jim-nas'ti-kạl), a. [< gymnastic + -al.] Same as gymnastic. [Rare.]

gymnastically (jim-nas'ti-kạl-i), adv. In a gymnastic manner; athletically; so as to fit for violent exertion.

Such as with agility and vigour . . . are not gymnastically composed, nor actively use those parts. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iv. 5.

gymnasticize (jim-nas'ti-sīz), v. i.; pret. and pp. gymnasticized, ppr. gymnasticizing. [< gymnastic + -ize.] To practise gymnastic or athletic exercises. Also spelled gymnasticise.

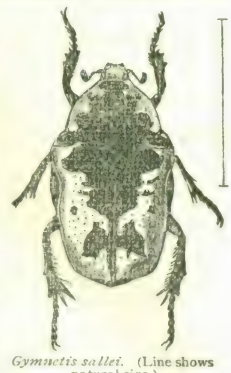
Pray during the holidays make Arthur ride hard and shoot often, and in short, gymnasticise in every possible manner. A. J. C. Hare, To Mrs. Stanley, 1828.

★gymnastics (jim-nas'tiks), n. sing. or pl. [Pl. of gymnastic: see -ics.] The art of performing athletic exercises; also, athletic exercises; feats of skill or address, mental or bodily.



The horse is an exercise unto which they have so naturall a disposition and addresse, that the whole earth doth not contain so many academies dedicated chiefly to this discipline, and other martial gymnastiques. Evelyn, State of France.

But you must not think to discredit these gymnastics by a little raillery, which has its foundation only in modern prejudices. Bp. Hurd, Age of Queen Elizabeth.

gymnaxony (jim-nak'sō-ni), n. [< Gr. γυμνός, naked, + ἄξων, axis.] A rare monstrosity in flowers, in which the placenta with its ovules is protruded from an orifice in the ovary.

Gymnetidæ (jim-net'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Gymnetis + -idæ.] A family of scarabæoid beetles, comprising 6 genera, having the scutellum hidden entirely or almost entirely by the prothoracic lobe. There are many American, African, and East Indian species. Burmeister, 1842.

Gymnetis (jim-nē'tis), n. [NL. (MacLeay, 1819), < Gr. γυμνῆτις, fem. of γυμνήτης, equiv. to γυμνής, and this equiv. to γυμνός, naked, bare.] The typical genus of the family Gymnetidæ. It is confined to America, and comprises over 100 species, all but two of which are South American. They are of medium size or rather large, and of characteristic aspect. The pattern of the markings is very variable; but none have metallic colors, and all are covered with a velvety efflorescence. They are found upon leaves in forests.

gymnic (jim'nik), a. and n. [Formerly also gymnick; < F. gymnique = Sp. gimnico = Pg. gymnico = It. ginnico, < L. gymnicus, < Gr. γυμνικός, of or for athletic exercises, < γυμνός, naked: see gymnasium.] I. a. Gymnastic. [Obsolete or archaic.]

Have they not sword-players, and every sort
Of gymnick artists, wrestlers, riders, runners?
Milton, S. A., l. 1324.

He [Alexander] offered sacrifices, and made games of musick, and gymnick sports, and exercises in honour of his gods. Abp. Ussher, Annals.

In Carian steel
Now Melibœus from the gymnic school,
Where he was daily exercis'd in arms, Approach'd. Glover, Athenaïd, viii.

II.† n. Athletic exercise.

The country hath his recreations, the City his several gymnics and exercises. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 313.

gymnical (jim'ni-kạl), a. [< gymnic + -al.] Same as gymnic.

gymnite (jim'nīt), n. [So called in allusion to the locality, Bare Hills in Maryland; < Gr. γυμνός, naked, bare, + -ite[2].] A mineral consisting of a hydrous silicate of magnesium: same as deweylite.

gymno-. [< Gr. γυμνός, naked, bare: see gymnasium.] An element in some scientific compounds of Greek origin, meaning 'naked,' 'bare': correlated with phæno- or phanero-, and opposed to crypto-, etc.

Gymnoblastea (jim″nō-blas-tē'ạ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + βλαστός, germ.] In Allman's system, an order of hydroid polyps, corresponding to the Anthomedusæ of Haeckel's later system, and commonly known as tubularian hydroids (in distinction from both campanularian and sertularian hydroids, which are calyptoblastic). They are hydromedusans which pass through a hydriform phase, and in which medusiform bodies are developed. Though the ectoderm may secrete a horny tubular protective case or perisarc, it forms no cups for the reception of the crown of tentacles, or cases inclosing groups of medusiform buds. In other words, no hydrothecæ or gonangia are present, whence the name of the order. The developed medusæ have no otocysts or tentaculocysts, but have ocelli at the bases of the tentacles, usually 4 or 6 in number, corresponding to the number of the radial enteric canals; the sexual glands are placed in the walls of the manubrium. The Gymnoblastea are delicate plant-like marine organisms, usually attached to some foreign body. Their classification is difficult and unsettled. They have been divided into from 2 to 21 families. More or less exact synonyms of the name of the order are Athecata, Corynida, Gymnotoka, and Tubularina. Also Gymnoblastææ.

gymnoblastic (jim-nō-blas'tik), a. [< Gr. γυμνός, naked, + βλαστός, germ, + -ic.] Having nutritive and reproductive buds or zoöids not covered or protected by horny receptacles; having no hydrothecæ or gonangia; specifically, of or pertaining to the Gymnoblastea.

We know less about the Trachomedusæ than about the Medusæ derived from Gymnoblastic or Calyptoblastic hydroids. A. G. Bourne, Proc. Roy. Soc., XXXVIII. 14.

Gymnobranchia (jim-nō-brang'ki-ạ), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Gymnobranchiata.

Gymnobranchiata (jim-nō-brang-ki-ā'tạ), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of gymnobranchiatus: see gymnobranchiate.] An order of opisthobranchiate gastropods with the gills exposed or contractible into a cavity on the surface of the mantle. They are shell-less in the adult state, but the young have shells and deciduous cephalic fins. Also called Nudibranchiata. Schweiger, 1820.

gymnobranchiate (jim-nō-brang'ki-āt), a. and n. [< NL. gymnobranchiatus, < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + βράγχια, gills: see branchiæ.] I. a. Having naked or exposed gills, as a gastropod; specifically, of or pertaining to the Gymnobranchiata; nudibranchiate.

II. n. A gastropod belonging to the Gymnobranchiata; a nudibranchiate.

gymnocarpous (jim-nō-kär'pus), a. [< Gr. γυμνός, naked, + καρπός, fruit.] In bot., having a naked fruit; especially, of lichens, having the apothecia expanded, saucer- or cup-shaped: applied to a large group of genera in which the apothecium is open and attached to the surface of the thallus.

gymnocaulus (jim-nō-kâ'lus), n. [NL., < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + καυλός, stalk, stem: see caulis.] The immature contractile stalk of a polypid, called by Sars the contractile cord, in such a form as Rhabdopleura. It eventually becomes the pectocaulus. E. R. Lankester.

Gymnocephalus (jim-nō-sef'a-lus), n. [NL., < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + κεφαλή, head.] 1. A genus of fishes. Bloch, 1801.—2. A notable genus of South American fruit-crows, of the subfamily Gymnoderinæ. The type and only species is G. calvus or G. capucinus. Geoffroy, 1809.

Gymnocerata (jim-nō-ser'a-tä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of gymnoceratus: see gymnoceratous.] A series of heteropterous insects, including those which are chiefly terrestrial and aërial, and have the antennæ prominent, whence the name: equivalent to the Geocorisæ of Latreille: contrasted with Cryptocerata.

These, with the subaquatic forms which we have just considered, compose the great section Gymnocerata of Fieber, just as the essentially aquatic assemblages belong to his . . . Cryptocerata. Stand. Nat. Hist., II. 276.

gymnoceratous (jim-nō-ser'a-tus), a. [< NL. gymnoceratus, < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + κέρας (κερατ-), horn.] In entom., having prominent antennæ; specifically, having the characters of the Gymnocerata.

Gymnochila (jim-nō-kī'lä), n. [NL. (Erichson, 1844), < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + χείλος, lip.] A genus of clavicorn beetles, of the family Trogositidæ. There are about a dozen species, all African, having the eyes divided in both sexes, and the superior parts strongly separated.

Gymnochilinæ (jim″nō-ki-lī'nē), n. pl. [NL. (Lacordaire, 1854, as Gymnochilides), < Gymnochila + -inæ.] A subfamily of Trogositidæ, represented by the genera Gymnochila, Leporina, and Anacrypta, having in the males 4 eyes, the upper pair large, the lower smaller.

Gymnochroa (jim-nok'rō-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. γυμνόχροος*, contr. γυμνόχρους, having the body naked, < γυμνός, naked, + χρόα, skin, surface.] The fresh-water group of hydroid hydrozoans containing the family Hydridæ: same as Eleutheroblastea.

gymnocidium (jim-nō-sid'i-um), n.; pl. gymnocidia (-ä). [NL., < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + -c- (a mere insertion) + dim. -ιδιον.] In bot., the swelling occasionally found at the base of the spore-case in urn-mosses.

Gymnocitta (jim-nō-sit'ä), n. [NL., < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + κίττα, Attic form of κίσσα, a chattering bird, perhaps the jay.] A notable genus of crow-like American jays with naked nostrils (whence the name), the jays usually having the nostrils feathered. The general form is that of a crow, with long pointed wings and short square tail; the color is entirely blue; and the bill is shaped like that of a starling. The only species is G. cyanocephala, the blue crow or piñon jay of western North America. Cyanocephalus is now the generic name.

Blue Crow (Gymnocitta cyanocephala).

Gymnocladus (jim-nok'lā-dus), n. [NL., < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + κλάδος, branch.] A genus of leguminous trees, closely allied to the honey-locust (Gleditsia), and indigenous in the upper Mississippi region. The only species, G. dioica, known as the Kentucky coffee-tree, is a large ornamental timber-tree with stout branchlets, doubly pinnate leaves, and small flowers, followed by long hard pods inclosing several large seeds. Its wood is heavy, strong, and durable, of a rich reddish-brown color, taking a high polish and occasionally used in cabinet-work. The seeds were formerly used as a substitute for coffee.

Kentucky Coffee-tree (Gymnocladus dioica). a, part of male flower, showing stamens; b, fruit; c, seed.

gymnocyta (jim-nos'i-tä), n. [NL., < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + κύτος, a hollow (a cell).] A unicellular organism which is naked or not corticate, and corresponds somewhat to species of Gymnomyxa: distinguished from lepocyta.

The zooids of this group [Infusoria] of the Protozoa are essentially unicellular; in the lowest forms they may consist of a naked cell (gymnocyta), or in the higher they may possess a cell-membrane (lepocyta). Stand. Nat. Hist., I. 26.

gymnocyte (jim'nō-sīt), n. [< gymnocyta.] A gymnocyta.

gymnocytode (jim-nō-sī'tōd), n. [< gymnocyte + -ode.] A naked non-nucleated cell or cytode. Haeckel.

gymnode (jim'nōd), n. A bird of the genus Gymnoderus.

Gymnoderinæ (jim-nod-e-rī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Gymnoderus + -inæ.] A subfamily of Cotingidæ, taking name from the genus Gymnoderus; the South American fruit-crows: so called from the nakedness of the throat of some species. The group includes the notable genera Querula, Pyroderus, Gymnoderus, Gymnocephalus, Cephalopterus, and Chasmorhynchus, or the averanos, arapungas, bell-birds, umbrella-birds, etc. Also called Coracinæ and Querulinæ. G. R. Gray, 1847.

Gymnoderus (jim-nod'e-rus), n. [NL., < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + δέρη, neck.] A genus of fruit-crows of South America, the type of the subfamily Gymnoderinæ. The only species is the gymnode, G. fœtidus or nudicollis. Geoffroy, 1809. Also called Coronis, and formerly Coracina. Also written Gymnodera.

Gymnodon (jim'nō-don), n. [NL., < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] The typical genus of Gymnodontes.

gymnodont (jim'nō-dont), a. and n. [As Gymnodon(t-).] I. a. Having naked teeth; specifically, pertaining to or having the characters of the Gymnodontidæ.

II. n. A gymnodont fish; one of the Gymnodontidæ.

Gymnodontes (jim-nō-don'tēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Gymnodon, q. v.] A group of plectognath fishes, variously rated. (a) In Cuvier's system of classification, the first family of plectognaths, having jaws which are furnished, instead of teeth, with an ivory-like substance internally laminated, resembling the beak of a parrot, and consisting of true teeth united and succeeding each other as fast as they are worn away. (b) In Günther's system, also, a family of plectognath fishes whose jaws are modified into a beak. (c) In Gill's system, a suborder of Plectognathi having no spinous dorsal fin, a body more or less sacciform, scales typically spiniform (archetypically rhomboid) and with root-like insertions, and toothless jaws enveloped in an enamel-like covering. It contains several families, as Diodontidæ, Triodontidæ, Tetrodontidæ, and Molidæ. Most of these fishes can blow themselves up into a more or less globular or spherical form by swallowing air, whence they have many popular names, as balloon-fish, bellows-fish, bottle-fish, box-fish, egg-fish, globe-fish, swell-fish or swell-toad, etc. (See globe-fish.) Some are covered with spines or prickles, whence such names as bur-fish, porcupine-fish, etc.; and the peculiarity of the teeth gives some of them the names rabbit-fish and parrot-fish.

Gymnodontidæ (jim-nō-don'ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Gymnodon(t-) + -idæ: see Gymnodon.] A family of plectognaths; the swell-fishes. See Gymnodontes.

gymnogen (jim'nō-jen), n. [< Gr. γυμνός, naked, + -γενης, producing: see -gen.] Same as gymnosperm.

gymnogene (jim'nō-jēn), n. [< NL. Gymnogenys, a generic name of the same bird, < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + γένυς = E. chin.] A book-name of an African hawk, Polyboroides typicus or P. capensis.

gymnogenous (jim-noj'e-nus), a. [< Gr. γυμνός, naked, + -γενης, producing: see -genous.] 1. In bot., same as gymnospermous.—2. In ornith., naked when hatched, as most altricial birds; psilopædic: opposed to hesthogenous or ptilopædic.

Gymnogramme (jim-nō-gram'ē), n. [< Gr. γυμνός, naked, + γραμμή, a mark, line, < γράφειν, write.] A generic name given by Desvaux in 1811 to certain polypodiaceous ferns. The diverse types later included by Hooker and Baker are now referred to numerous genera of which the following occur in North America: Leptogramma, Austrogramme, Pleuroserus, Gymnopteris, Anogramma, Ceropteris, Pterozonium, Hecistopteris, Psilogramme, Bommeria, and Trismeria. It included several of the gold- and silver-ferns.

a, Silver-fern (Ceropteris tartarea); b, Bommeria hispida.

gymnogynous (jim-noj'i-nus), a. [< Gr. γυμνός, naked, + γυνή, female (in mod. bot. an ovary).] In bot., having a naked ovary.

Gymnolæmata (jim-nō-lē'ma-tä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + λαιμός, the throat.] An order of ectoproctous or infundibulate Polyzoa. It contains chiefly marine forms which have no epistome or valve to close down upon the mouth, no horseshoe-shaped lophophore, and a complete circlet of tentacles. The external skeleton is diversiform, chitinous, calcareous, or gelatinous. The young hatch as ciliated embryos which swim freely for a time. The order is divided into three suborders, Cyclostomata, Ctenostomata, and Chilostomata, to which some add a fourth, Paludicellæ, containing fresh-water forms which have statoblasts. Most polyzoans belong to this order, the families of which are numerous. They commonly resemble seaweeds, and some are known as sea-mats. The order is contrasted with Phylactolæmata. Also, incorrectly, Gymnolæma.

gymnolæmatous (jim-nō-lē'ma-tus), a. Of or pertaining to the Gymnolæmata.

Gymnoloma (jim-nō-lō'mä), n. [NL., < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + λῶμα, the hem or fringe of a robe.] A genus of South African scarabæoid beetles, giving name to the family Gymnolomidæ. They have the two terminal teeth of the fore tibiæ free, and all the tarsal claws simple. About 12 species are known. Dejean, 1833.

Gymnolomidæ (jim-nō-lom'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Gymnoloma + -idæ.] A family of Coleoptera, usually merged in Melolonthidæ. Burmeister, 1844.

Gymnomera (jim-nō-mē'rä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of gymnomerus: see gymnomerous.] A division of cladocerous crustaceans; a suborder of Cladocera, having a small shell, short legs, and rudimentary branchiæ: contrasted with Calyptomera. It contains the families Podontidæ, Polyphemidæ, and Leptodoridæ.

gymnomerous (jim-nō-mē'rus), a. [< NL. gymnomerus, < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + μηρός, thigh.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Gymnomera.

Gymnomyxa (jim-nō-mik'sä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + μύξα, slime, mucus, also equiv. to μυκτήρ, the nose: see mucus.] A lower grade or series of Protozoa, including those protozoans which are naked or not corticate, and consequently of no determinate form. They may protrude filose or lobose pseudopodia, or exude plasmodia, and ingest food at any place in their bodies; many of them construct hard shells of great beauty and complexity; and they may also become encysted. An amœba is a type of the whole series, which includes the mycetozoans, amœbæ, labyrinthulines, heliozoans, foraminifers, and radiolarians.

gymnomyxine (jim-nō-mik'sin), a. [As Gymnomyxa + -ine[1].] Consisting of naked protoplasm or animal slime; specifically, having the characters of the Gymnomyxa.

gymnomyxon (jim-nō-mik'son), n. A member of the Gymnomyxa.

Gymnonoti (jim-nō-nō'tī), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Gymnonotus.] An order or suborder of fishes, containing the electric eels. They are anguilliform, with a tapering tail; have no dorsal or ventral fins, but a very extensive anal fin, the vent being consequently at the throat, and the anal fin extending thence to the end of the tail; the body naked or provided with small scales; the mouth small; and the gill-slits narrow. The group contains a single family, Gymnonotidæ, or, according to others, two families, Electrophoridæ and Sternopygidæ, the latter not electric. See cut under eel.

Gymnonotus (jim-nō-nō'tus), n. [NL., so called with ref. to the absence of dorsal fins; < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + νῶτος, back.] Same as Gymnotus, of which it is the uncontracted form.

Gymnopædes (jim-nō-pē'dēz), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + παῖς (παιδ-), child.] In ornith., same as Psilopædes.

gymnopædia (jim-nō-pē'di-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. γυμνοπαιδίαι, < γυμνός, naked, + παιδιά, childish play, < παίζειν, play like a child.] An annual festival of ancient Sparta, so named from the dances and choruses performed by naked boys round the statues of Apollo, Artemis, and Leto, in commemoration of the victory of 100 Spartan over 100 Argive champions at Thyrea.

gymnopædic (jim-nō-pē′dik), a. [< Gr. γυμνοπαιδικός*, in fem. γυμνοπαιδική (sc. ὀρχησις, dance), a dance of naked boys, < γυμνός, naked, + παῖς (παιδ-), boy, child (> παιδικός, of a boy).] 1. Of or pertaining to naked boys: applied by the ancient Greeks to dances and gymnastic exercises performed, as at public festivals, by boys or youths unclothed.

In the time of Thaletas, Sacadas, &c. (Ol. 40–50), the gymnopædic, hyporchematic, and other kinds of orchestics were already cultivated in a highly artistic manner. C. O. Müller, Manual of Archæol. (trans.), § 77.

2. In ornith., same as psilopædic.

Gymnophiona (jim-nō-fī′ō-nä), n. pl. [NL. (Müller, 1832), < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + ὀφιόν-ος, serpent-like.] A major division of Amphibia, having a serpentiform body, no limbs, the tail obsolete in the adult, the anus terminal, and numerous minute dermal scutes in the integument of the body. The division includes only the family Cæciliidæ, and the term is a synonym of Ophiomorpha.

Gymnophthalmata (jim-nof-thal′mą-tä), n. pl. [NL., prop. Gymnophthalma*, < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + ὀφθαλμός, eye.] A general name of the naked-eyed medusæ, craspedote Hydromedusæ, having a muscular velum and the marginal sense-organs uncovered.

gymnophthalmate (jim-nof-thal′māt), a. Same as gymnophthalmatous.

gymnophthalmatous (jim-nof-thal′mą-tus), a. [As Gymnophthalmata + -ous.] Of or pertaining to the Gymnophthalmata, or so-called naked-eyed Medusæ. Also gymnophthalmous.

The gonophores of the Siphonophora present every variety, from a simple form . . . to free medusoids of the Gymnophthalmatous type. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 129.

Gymnophthalmidæ (jim-nof-thal′mi-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Gymnophthalmus + -idæ.] A family of snake-like lizards, typified by the genus Gymnophthalmus, having rudimentary limbs and eyelids which leave the eyes uncovered.

gymnophthalmous (jim-nof-thal′mus), a. Same as gymnophthalmatous.

Gymnophthalmus (jim-nof-thal′mus), n. [NL., < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + ὀφθαλμός, eye.] The typical genus of lizards of the family Gymnophthalmidæ.

Gymnops (jim′nops), n. [NL., < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + ὤψ, eye, face.] A genus of birds. (a) A Cuvierian (1829) genus of sturnoid passerine birds, containing the Philippine G. tricolor or G. calvus, with some heterogeneous species. (b) A genus of South American polyborine hawks: same as Daptrius or Ibycter. Spix, 1824.

Gymnoptera (jim-nop′tę-rä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of gymnopterus: see gymnopterous.] In De Geer's system (1752), a division of insects, including Lepidoptera, Neuroptera, Hymenoptera, and some other forms with unsheathed wings, as ephemerids, aphids, and cicadas. In Latreille's system, the Gymnoptera were composed of the three orders above named, with Diptera and Suctoria, and the term was contrasted with Elytroptera.

gymnopterous (jim-nop′tę-rus), a. [< NL. gymnopterus, < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + πτερόν, wing, = E. feather.] In entom., having clear or naked wings, without scales or hairs; not having sheathed wings; not elytropterous; specifically, of or pertaining to the Gymnoptera.

Gymnorhina (jim-nō-rī′nä), n. [NL., < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + ῥίς (ῥιν-), nose.] A genus of piping-crows or crow-shrikes, typical of the subfamily Gymnorhininæ. G. tibicen is a well-known species, sometimes called flute-bird, entirely black and white, Black-backed Piping-crow (Gymnorhina tibicen).

these colors being massed in large areas; the bill also is whitish. It is a native of Australia, and is a noisy, showy bird, often seen in confinement, and capable of being taught to speak a few words and play a variety of amusing antics. G. R. Gray, 1840.

gymnorhinal (jim-nō-rī′nąl), a. [< Gr. γυμνός, naked, + ῥίς (ῥιν-), nose, + -al.] In ornith., having naked nostrils; having the nostrils unfeathered: an epithet of sundry birds, especially of certain jays and auks, which are distinguished by this circumstance in their respective families, in which the nostrils are usually feathered.

Gymnorhininæ (jim″nō-ri-nī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Gymnorhina + -inæ.] A group of oscine passerine birds related to crows and shrikes, inhabiting the Austromalayan region, and composed of such genera as Gymnorhina, Strepera, and Cracticus; the piping-crows, or crow-shrikes. Streperinæ is a synonym.

Gymnorhinus (jim-nō-rī′nus), n. [NL.: see Gymnorhina.] In ornith., same as Gymnocitta. Maximilian, 1841.

Gymnosomata (jim-nō-sō′mą-tä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of gymnosomatus:* see gymnosomatous.] An order of pteropods, of the class Pteropoda, having distinct head and foot, no mantle or developed shell (whence the name), the head usually provided with tentacles, and the fins attached to the neck. The term is contrasted with Thecosomata, and is synonymous with Pterobranchia. The order was established by De Blainville in 1824.

The Gymnosomata are naked pteropods, in which the head is distinct and well separated from the body and foot, and in which well developed tentacles are present. The wings are distinct from the foot and external gills are present in one family. The young are at first provided with a shell and swim by means of a velum, but soon both these embryonic structures are lost. Stand. Nat. Hist., I. 359.

gymnosomatous (jim-nō-som′ą-tus), a. [< NL. gymnosomatus*, < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + σῶμα, body.] Having the body naked; specifically, having the characters of the Gymnosomata; not thecosomatous: as, a gymnosomatous pteropod.

gymnosomous (jim-nō-sō′mus), a. Same as gymnosomatous.

gymnosophical (jim-nō-sof′i-kąl), a. [As gymnosoph-ist + -ic-al.] Pertaining to the Gymnosophists or to gymnosophy.

Gymnosophist (jim-nos′ō-fist), n. [< L. gymnosophistæ, pl., < Gr. γυμνοσοφισταί, pl., < γυμνός, naked, + σοφιστής, a philosopher: see sophist.] One of a sect of ancient Hindu philosophers who lived solitarily in the woods, wore little clothing, ate no flesh, renounced all bodily pleasures, and addicted themselves to mystical contemplation: so called by Greek writers. By some they are regarded as Brahmin penitents; others include among them a sect of Buddhist ascetics, the Shamans.

Philostratus speaketh of Gymnosophists, which some ascribe to India; Heliodorus to Æthiopia; he to Æthiopia and Egypt. . . . If a man at Memphis had by chance-medly killed a man, he was exiled till those Gymnosophists absolued him. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 579.

gymnosophy (jim-nos′ō-fi), n. [As gymnosoph-ist + -y.] The doctrines and practices of the Gymnosophists.

gymnosperm (jim′nō-spėrm), n. [< NL. gymnospermus: see gymnospermous.] A plant belonging to the Gymnospermæ, characterized by naked seeds. Compare angiosperm. Also called gymnogen.

Gymnospermæ (jim-nō-spėr′mē), n. pl. [NL., fem. pl. of gymnospermus: see gymnospermous.] A class of plants of the phylum Spermatophyta, coördinate with the Angiospermæ, and characterized by naked ovules (not inclosed within an ovary, and fertilized by immediate contact with the pollen), and by the absence of a perianth (except in the Gnetaceæ). The cotyledons are two or more, and the flowers are strictly unisexual. The class includes the living orders Cycadales, Ginkgoales, Pinales, and Gnetales, and the extinct orders Cordaitales and Bennettitales. All are trees or shrubs, mostly evergreen and resinous. The wood is peculiar in being composed mainly of disk-bearing tissue without proper vessels. In the character of the sexual organs and the mode of reproduction this class marks a transition from the vascular cryptogams to the angiosperms, and fossil remains show it to have been prevalent in the Devonian period, long prior to the appearance of angiosperms, and about as ancient as any other terrestrial vegetation.

gymnospermal (jim-nō-spėr′mąl), a. [< gymnosperm + -al.] Relating to gymnosperms, or to naked ovules and seeds in plants.

Gymnospermia (jim-nō-spėr′mi-ä), n. pl. [NL., < gymnospermus: see gymnospermous.] The first order of the Linnæan class Didynamia, corresponding to the family Menthaceæ. See Angiospermia.

gymnospermous (jim-nō-spėr′mus), a. [< NL. gymnospermus, < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + σπέρμα, seed.] In bot., of, pertaining to, or resembling the Gymnospermæ; having naked seeds: opposed to angiospermous. Also gymnogenous.

Gymnosporangium (jim″nō-spō-ran′ji-um), n. [NL.; < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + NL. sporangium, q. v.] A genus of fungi, of the order Uredinales, having mostly two-celled (sometimes one- to six-celled) yellow or orange spores borne on slender pedicels, and embedded in jelly, which when moistened swells into columnar or irregularly expanded masses. The species are parasitic on the leaves and branches of coniferous trees belonging to the tribe Cupressineæ, in which they produce various distortions. See cedar-apple.

gymnosporous (jim-nos′pō-rus), a. [< NL. gymnosporus, < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + σπόρος, a seed: see spore.] In bot., having naked spores.

gymnostomous (jim-nos′tō-mus), a. [< Gr. γυμνός, naked, + στόμα, mouth.] In bot., having no peristome: applied to the capsule of mosses.

gymnote (jim′nōt), n. [< Gymnotus.] A fish of the genus Gymnotus.

gymnotetraspermous (jim-nō-tet-ra-spėr′mus), a. [< Gr. γυμνός, naked, + τέσσαρες (τετρα-), = E. four, + σπέρμα, seed.] Having four naked seeds: formerly applied to the labiates, etc., upon the supposition that the nutlets are naked seeds.

gymnotid (jim′nō-tid), n. A fish of the family Gymnotidæ.

Gymnotidæ (jim-not′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Gymnotus + -idæ.] In Günther's classification of fishes, a family of the order Physostomi. They are characterized by having the body eel-shaped; the margin of the upper jaw formed in the middle by the intermaxillaries and laterally by the maxillaries; the dorsal fin absent or reduced to an adipose strip, the caudal generally absent, and the tail ending in a point; the anal fin extremely long; no ventral fins present; and the anus situated a little way behind the throat.

Gymnotoca (jim-not′ō-kä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + τίκτειν, τεκεῖν, bring forth, τόκος, a bringing forth, offspring.] The tubularian hydroids, or gymnoblastic Hydromedusæ, having their genital products uncovered: opposed to Skenotoca. See Gymnoblastea.

gymnotocous (jim-not′ō-kus), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Gymnotoca; gymnoblastic, as a tubularian hydromedusan.

gymnotoid (jim′nō-toid), a. and n. I. a. Of or relating to the Gymnotidæ.

II. n. A fish of the family Gymnotidæ.

Gymnotus (jim-nō′tus), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1748), contr. of Gymnonotus, q. v.] 1. A genus of fishes. (a) By Linnæus made to include all the Gymnonoti known to him, but not at first the electric eel. (b) By Cuvier restricted to the electric eel, Gymnotus electricus, afterward distinguished as the type of the genus Electrophorus. See electric eel, under eel. (c) By later authors restricted to the Gymnotus carapo (Linnæus), otherwise called Sternopygus. Also Gymnonotus.

2. [l. c.] A fish of the genus Gymnotus.—3. In entom., a genus of curculios, based on the Brazilian G. geometricus, the Cholus geometricus of Germar. Chevrolat, 1879.

Gymnozoida (jim-nō-zō′i-dä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + ζῷον, a living being.] In Saville Kent's system of classification (1880), a section of Infusoria, containing the ordinary naked collar-bearing monadiform infusorians: opposed to Sarcocrypta or sponges. Kent included the sponges in his "legion" Infusoria, considering a sponge as an aggregate of choanoflagellate infusorian zoöids; whence the contrasted terms Discosomata gymnozoida and Discosomata sarcocrypta for the two sections of Choanoflagellata. Kent's Gymnozoida consists of three families, Codonosigidæ, Salpingœcidæ, and Phalansteriidæ.

gymnozoidal (jim-nō-zō′i-dąl), a. Naked, as a zoöid; specifically, of or pertaining to the Gymnozoida. S. Kent.

Gymnura (jim-nū′rä), n. [NL., < Gr. γυμνός, naked, + οὐρά, the tail.] 1. A genus of insectivorous mammals, typical of the subfamily Gymnurinæ. G. rafflesi inhabits Malaysia, and resembles a large rat with an unusually long snout and long scaly tail. It is known as the bulau. Vigors and Horsfield, 1827.

2. Same as Erismatura.

gymnure (jim′nūr), n. An animal of the genus Gymnura.

Gymnurinæ (jim-nū-rī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Gymnura + -inæ.] A subfamily of the insectivorous family Erinaceidæ, having numerous caudal vertebræ, the palate well ossified, no spines in the fur, and the dental formula i. $\frac{3}{3}$, c. $\frac{1}{1}$, pm. $\frac{4}{4}$, m. $\frac{3}{3} \times 2 = 44$. There are two genera, Gymnura and Hylomys.

gyn[1]†, v. An obsolete spelling of gin[1].

gyn[2]†, n. An obsolete spelling of gin[4].

gynæceum (jin-ē-sē′um), n.; pl. gynæcea (-ä). ★[L. gynæceum or gynæcium, < Gr. γυναικεῖον, the women's apartment or division of a house, neut. of γυναικεῖος, of or belonging to women, < γυνή (γυναικ-), a woman, a female, = AS. cwēn, a woman, E. queen and quean, q. v.] 1. Among the ancients, the part of a dwelling of the better class devoted to the use of women—generally the remotest part, lying beyond an interior court; hence, in occasional use, a similar division of any house or establishment where the sexes are separated, as a Mohammedan harem. Also gyneconitis.

> Women, up till this > Cramp'd under worse than South-sea-isle taboo, > Dwarfs of the gynæceum, fail so far
> In high desire. Tennyson, Princess, iii.

2. A manufactory or establishment in ancient Rome for making clothes and furniture for the emperor's family, the managers of which were women.—3. See gynæcium.

gynæcium, n. Same as gynæcium.

gynæcocosmos (ji-nē-kō-koz'mos), n. [< Gr. γυναικοκόσμος, < γυνή (γυναικ-), a woman, + κόσμος, order, decency.] Same as gynæconomos.

gynæcocracy, gynæcological, gynæcologist, etc. See gynecocracy, etc.

gynæconomos (jin-ē-kon'ō-mos), n. [< Gr. γυναικονόμος, < γυνή (γυναικ-), a woman, + νέμειν, regulate, manage.] One of a body of magistrates in ancient Athens especially charged with the execution of the sumptuary laws relating to women, and of various police laws for the observance of decency in public and private. One of their chief duties, which was sternly enforced, was the maintenance of good order in all respects in the great public processions and religious embassies, such as that to the Delphian sanctuary.

gynander (ji-nan'dėr), n. [< Gr. γύνανδρος, of doubtful sex, < γυνή, a female (in mod. bot. a pistil), + ἀνήρ (ἀνδρ-), male: see Gynandria.] 1. An effeminate man. [Rare.]

> An emasculated type, product of short-haired women and long-haired men, gynanders and androgynes.
> Scribner's Mag., III. 631.

2. A plant belonging to the class Gynandria.

Gynandria (ji-nan'dri-ą), n. pl. [NL.] The twentieth class in the vegetable system of Linnæus, characterized by having gynandrous flowers, as in all orchidaceous plants.

Gynandria.

A, section of flower of Rletia; B, separated column of same, composed of the united style and filaments, bearing the stigma (s) and anthers (an).

gynandrian (ji-nan'dri-an), a. [< Gynandria.] Of or pertaining to the class Gynandria.

gynandromorphism (ji-nan-drō-môr'fizm), n. [< Gr. γυνή, female, + ἀνήρ (ἀνδρ-), male, + μορφή, form, + -ism.] In entom., a variation or monstrosity in which the peculiar characters of the male and female are found in the same individual.

gynandromorphous (ji-nan-drō-môr'fus), a. [< Gr. γύνανδρος, of doubtful sex (see gynander), + μορφή, form.] In entom., having both male and female characters: applied to certain rare individuals among insects which by their forms and markings are apparently female in one part of the body and male in another.

> Mr. Curtis has figured a singular gynandromorphous individual of Tenthredo cingulata, in which the opposite sides are not symmetrical, the right half being feminine and the left masculine. Westwood.

gynandrophore (ji-nan'drō-fōr), n. [< Gr. γυνή, female (pistil), + ἀνήρ (ἀνδρ-), male (stamen), + -φόρος, < φέρειν = E. bear[1].] A gynophore which bears the stamens as well as the pistil, as in some Capparidaceæ. See cut under gynophore.

> The "gynophore" or the "gynandrophore."
> Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 342.

gynandrosporous (jin-an-dros'pō-rus), a. [< Gr. γύνανδρος, of doubtful sex (see gynander), + σπόρος, a seed.] In the Œdogoniaceæ, among algæ, provided with male individuals which attach themselves to or near the oögonium. The male plant originates as a special zoöspore called an androspore, and, attaching itself, produces by growth a plant of three or four cells, called a dwarf male. The upper cell of the latter produces antherozoids which fertilize the oösphere.

gynandrous (ji-nan'drus), a. [< Gr. γύνανδρος, of doubtful sex.] In bot., having the stamens adnate to and apparently borne upon the pistil, as in Asclepias and all orchids; belonging to the Linnæan class Gynandria.

gynantherous (ji-nan'thę-rus), a. [< Gr. γυνή, female (pistil), + ἀνθηρός, flowery (anther).] In bot., having stamens converted into pistils.

gynarchy (jin'är-ki), n.; pl. gynarchies (-kiz). [< Gr. γυνή, a woman, + ἀρχειν, rule.] Government by a woman or by women; the rule of women. Formerly also written gunarchy.

> I have always some hopes of change under a gynarchy.
> Chesterfield.

gynecian, gynæcian (ji-nē'shian), a. [< Gr. γυνή (γυναικ-), a woman, + -ian.] Relating to women.

gynecic, gynæcic (ji-nē'sik), a. [< Gr. γυναικικός, of woman, < γυνή (γυναικ-), woman.] In med. and surg., pertaining to diseases peculiar to women.

gynecocracy, gynæcocracy (jin-ē-kok'ra-si), n. [Also gynocracy, and sometimes improp. gyneocracy, gynœocracy, < Gr. γυναικοκρατία, government by women (cf. γυναικοκρατεῖσθαι, be ruled by women), < γυνή (γυναικ-), a woman, + κράτος, power, κρατεῖν, rule.] Government by a woman or by women; female power or rule.

gynecological, gynæcological (ji-nē-kō-loj'i-kal), a. [< gynecology, gynæcology, + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to gynecology.

gynecologist, gynæcologist (jin-ē-kol'ō-jist), n. [< gynecology, gynæcology, + -ist.] One versed in, or engaged in the study and practice of, gynecology.

gynecology, gynæcology (jin-ē-kol'ō-ji), n. [< Gr. γυνή (γυναικ-), a woman, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] In med. and surg., the science of the diseases peculiar to women.

gynecomasty, gynæcomasty (ji-nē'kō-mas-ti), n. [< Gr. γυνή (γυναικ-), a woman, + μαστός, breast.] In physiol., the condition of a man having breasts as large as those of a woman, and functionally active.

> The mammæ of men will, under special excitation, yield milk; there are various cases of gynæcomasty on record, and in famines infants whose mothers have died have been thus saved. H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 441.

gyneconitis, gynæconitis (ji-nē-kō-nī'tis), n. [< Gr. γυναικωνῖτις, equiv. to γυναικεῖον, gynæceum: see gynæceum.] 1. Same as gynæceum, 1.

> I often saw parties of women mount the stairs to the Gynæconitis. R. F. Burton, El-Medinah, p. 190.

2. In the early ch. and in the Gr. Ch., the part of the church occupied by women. Formerly the women of the congregation occupied either the northern side of the church or galleries at the sides and over the narthex. In Greek churches they take their places in the narthex or at the sides of the church.

> The women's gallery, or gynæconitis, formed an important part of the earlier Byzantine churches.
> J. M. Neale, Eastern Church, i. 206.

gynecophore, gynæcophore (ji-nē'kō-fōr), n. [< Gr. γυνή (γυναικ-), female, + -φόρος, < φέρειν = E. bear[1].] A receptacle in the body of the male of some animals, as the dicœcious trematodes, in which the female is contained; the gynecophoric canal, or canalis gynæcophorus.

> The formidable Bilharzia, the male of which is the larger and retains the female in a gynæcophore.
> Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 178.

gynecophoric, gynæcophoric (ji-nē-kō-for'ik), a. [As gynecophore, gynæcophore, + -ic.] In zoöl., pertaining to or of the nature of a gynecophore: applied to the canal of the male in certain Entozoa, as Bilharzia, in which the female lodges during copulation.

gynecophorous, gynæcophorous (jin-ē-kof'ō-rus), a. [As gynecophore, gynæcophore, + -ous.] Bearing the female; containing the female: as, a gynecophorous worm; a gynecophorous canal. See gynecophore.

gynecratic, gynæcratic (jin-ē-krat'ik), a. [< Gr. γυνή, a woman, + -κρατικός, as in aristocratic, etc.] Of or pertaining to government by women.

> The gynæcratic habits of the race are manifested in the names of all these kings, which were formed by a combination of those of their parents, the mother's generally preceding that of the father. Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 345.

gyneocracy, gynæocracy (jin-ē-ok'ra-si), n. Same as gynecocracy.

> The Mother-right and gyneocracy among the Iroquois here plainly indicated is not overdrawn.
> L. H. Morgan, Amer. Ethnol., p. 66.

gyneolatry, gynæolatry (jin-ē-ol'ą-tri), n. [Prop. gynæcolatry*, < Gr. γυνή (γυναικ-), woman, + λατρεία, worship.] Extravagant devotion to or worship of woman.

> We find in the Commedia the image of the Middle Ages, and the sentimental gyniolatry of chivalry, which was at best but skin-deep, is lifted in Beatrice to an ideal and universal plane.
> Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 36.

Gynerium (ji-nē'ri-um), n. [NL. (so called from the woolly stigmas), < Gr. γυνή, female (pistil), + ἔριον, wool.] A genus of tall perennial reedy grasses of a single species, G. sagittatum, which is distributed from southern Mexico to Paraguay and southern Brazil. It is locally known as "uva," and the plume-like panicles are used for decorative purposes.

gynethusia (jin-ē-thū'si-ą), n. [Prop. gynæcothysia*, < Gr. γυνή (γυναικ-), woman, + θυσία, an offering, sacrifice, < θύειν, sacrifice.] The sacrifice of women.

> A kind of Suttee—gynethusia, as it has been termed.
> Archæologia, XLII. 188.

gyngevret, n. An obsolete variant of ginger[1]. Rom. of the Rose.

gyno-. [A shortened form of gynæco-, gyneco-, combining forms of Gr. γυνή (γυναικ-), a woman, female: see gynæceum.] An element in modern botanical terms, meaning 'pistil' or 'ovary.'

Gynobase.

Section of Gynœcium of Borage, enlarged, showing gynobase (a) bearing the carpels and style.

gynobase (jin'ō-bās), n. [< Gr. γυνή, a female, + βάσις, base.] In bot., a short conical or flat elevation of the receptacle of a flower, bearing the gynœcium.

gynobasic (jin-ō-bā'sik), a. [< gynobase + -ic.] In bot., pertaining to or having a gynobase.—Gynobasic style, a style that originates from near the base of the pistil.

gynocracy (ji-nok'ra-si), n. Same as gynecocracy.

> The aforesaid state has repeatedly changed from absolute despotism to republicanism, not forgetting the intermediate stages of oligarchy, limited monarchy, and even gynocracy; for I myself remember Alsatia governed for nearly nine months by an old fish-woman.
> Scott, Fortunes of Nigel, xvii.

gynodiœcious (jin″ō-dī-ē'shius), a. [< Gr. γυνή, female (pistil), + diœcious, q. v.] In bot., having perfect and female flowers upon separate plants. See diœcious, 2. Darwin.

gynœcium (ji-nē'si-um), n.; pl. gynœcia (-ą). [NL., orig. an erroneous form of gynæceum, but now regarded as Gr. γυνή, female (pistil), + οἶκος, house.] The pistil or collective pistils of a flower; the female portion of a flower as a whole: correlative to andrœcium. Also gynæcium, gynæceum.

gynomonœcious (jin″ō-mō-nē'shius), a. [< Gr. γυνή, female (pistil), + monœcious, q. v.] In bot., having both female and perfect flowers upon the same plant. Darwin.

Flower of Sinapistrum. a, gynophore.

gynophagite (ji-nof'ą-jīt), n. [< Gr. γυνή, a woman, + φαγειν, eat.] A woman-eater. Davies. [Rare.]

> He preys upon the weaker sex, and is a Gynophagite. Bulwer, My Novel, iii. 22.

gynophore (jin'ō-fōr), n. [< Gr. γυνή, female, + -φόρος, < φέρειν = E. bear[1]. Cf. gynecophore.] 1. In bot., an elongation or internode of the receptacle of a flower, bearing the gynœcium, as the stipe of a pod in some Brassicaceæ and Capparidaceæ.—2. In Hydrozoa, the branch of a gonoblastidium which bears female gonophores, or those reproductive receptacles or generative buds which contain ova only, as distinguished from male gonophores or androphores. See cut under gonoblastidium.

gynophoric (jin-ō-for'ik), a. [< gynophore + -ic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of a gynophore.

gynoplastic (jin-ō-plas'tik), a. [< Gr. γυνή, female, + πλάσσειν, form, mold.] In surg., noting an operation for opening or dilating the closed or contracted genital openings of the female.

gynostegium (jin-ō-stē'ji-um), n.; pl. gynostegia (-ą). [NL., < Gr. γυνή, female (pistil), + στέγη, a roof.] In bot., a sheath or covering of the gynœcium, of whatever nature. Gray.

gynostemium (jin-ō-stē'mi-um), n.; pl. gynostemia (-ą). [NL., < Gr. γυνή, female (pistil), + στήμων, stamen.] The column of an orchid, consisting of the united style and stamens.

gyp (jip), n. [In the first sense said to be a sportive application of Gr. γύψ, a vulture, with ref. to their supposed dishonest rapacity; but prob. in this, as in the second sense, an abbr.

of gypsy, gipsy, as applied to a sly, unscrupulous fellow.] 1. A male servant who attends to college rooms. Also gip. [Cant, Cambridge University, England; corresponding to scout as used at Oxford.]

The Freshman, when once safe through his examination, is first inducted into his rooms by a gyp, usually recommended to him by his tutor.
C. A. Bristed, English University, p. 29.

2. A swindler, especially a swindling horse-dealer; a cheat. Philadelphia Times, May 27, 1880. [Slang.]

gyp (jip), v. t. [< gyp, n.] To swindle; cheat. Philadelphia Times, May 31, 1880. [Slang.]

Gypaëtidæ (jip-ā-et′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Gypaëtus + -idæ.] The bearded vultures as a family of raptorial birds. G. R. Gray, 1842.

Gypaëtus, Gypaëtos (ji-pā′e-tus, -tos), n. [NL. (Starr, 1784), < Gr. γυπάετος (as if < γύψ, a vulture, + ἀετός, an eagle), another reading, appar. erroneous, of ὑπάετος (Aristotle), a kind of vulture, perhaps the lammergeier, < ὑπό, below (that is, less than or inferior to), + ἀετός, an eagle.] A genus of highly raptorial old-world vultures, containing the bearded vulture, Bearded Vulture, or Griffin (Gypaëtus barbatus).

griffin, or lammergeier, G. barbatus: sometimes made the type of a subfamily Gypaëtinæ, or of a family Gypaëtidæ.

Gypagus (jip′ā-gus), n. [NL. (Vieillot, 1816), < Gyp(s) + (Harp)agus.] A genus of American vultures, sometimes separated from Sarcorhamphus, of the family Cathartidæ, of which the king-vulture, G. papa, is the type and only representative.

gypell†, n. [ME.: see gipon, jupon.] Same as jupon.

Hys fomen were well boun
To perce hys acketoun, Gypell, mayl, and plate.
Lybeaus Disconus (Ritson's Metr. Rom., II. 50).

Gypogeranidæ (jip″ō-je-ran′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Gypogeranus + -idæ.] A family of grallatorial raptorial birds of Africa, named from the genus Gypogeranus. Also called Serpentariidæ. Selys de Longchamps, 1842.

Gypogeranus (jip-ō-jer′a-nus), n. [NL., < Gr. γύψ, a vulture, + γέρανος, a crane.] A genus of grallatorial raptorial birds, containing the secretary-bird or serpent-eater of Africa, G. serpentarius or reptilivorus, and giving name to the family Gypogeranidæ: same as Sagittarius, Vosmaer, 1769; Serpentarius, Cuvier, 1797; Secretarius, Daudin, 1801; Ophiotheres, Vieillot, 1816. See Serpentarius. Illiger, 1811.

Gypohieracinæ (jip-ō-hī″e-rā-sī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Gypohierax (-ac-) + -inæ.] A subfamily of old-world vultures, of which the genus Gypohierax is the type. G. R. Gray, 1844.

Gypohierax (jip-ō-hī′e-raks), n. [NL., irreg. < Gr. γύψ, a vulture, + ἱέραξ, a hawk, falcon.] A genus of old-world vultures, the eagle-vultures, such as the Angola vulture, G. angolensis, of western Africa, mostly white with black wings and tail and flesh-colored feet and head: sometimes made the type of a subfamily Gypohieracinæ. Rüppell, 1835. Also called Racama.

Angola Vulture (Gypohierax angolensis).

gypont, gypount, n. Same as jupon.

gyp-room (jip′röm), n. The room in a college suite in which are kept the utensils for the serving of meals. [Cant.]

Others of these studies, when not effaced by modern alterations, have become gyp-rooms, for the use of the college servants, or box-rooms.
Quarterly Rev., CXLV. 436.

Gyps (jips), n. [NL. (J. C. Savigny, 1809), < Gr. γύψ, a vulture.] The largest genus of old-world vultures, containing the several species known as griffins or griffin-vultures, having the nostrils oval and perpendicular, and the rectrices 14. They range over most of Africa, all the countries bordering the Mediterranean, and eastward to Persia, India, and the Malay peninsula. The common griffin is G. fulvus of Europe and Africa; G. rueppelli and G. kolbi are both African; G. himalayensis and G. indicus are named from the regions they respectively inhabit; and several other species or varieties have been described.

gypset (jips), n. [ME. gipse, < OF. gipse, gypse, < L. gypsum, gypsum: see gypsum.] Same as gypsum.

The soil of Cyprus is for the most part rocky; there are in it many entire hills of talc or gypse, some running in plates, and another sort in shoots, like crystal.
Pococke, Description of the East, II. i. 229.

gypset (jips), v. t. [ME. gipsen; < gypse, n.] To cover with gypsum; plaster.

In pottes trie
Now gipse it fast.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 205.

gypseous (jip′sē-us), a. [< L. gypseus, of gypsum, < gypsum, gypsum: see gypsum.] 1. Of the nature of gypsum; partaking of the qualities of gypsum; resembling gypsum.

The provinces also endeavored, in 1842, to produce artificial Marbles. M. Mondon, of Vienna, claimed to have found a material suitable for this purpose in the department of Charente. He calls it gypseous alabaster — a soft substance which must first be hardened.
Marble-Worker, § 135.

2. In bot., very dull grayish-white.

gypsere†, n. See gipser.

gypsery, n. See gipsery.

Gypsey, n. and a. See Gipsy.

gypsiferous (jip-sif′e-rus), a. [< L. gypsum, gypsum, + ferre = E. bear[1].] Producing gypsum.

gypsify, v. t. See gipsify.

gypsine (jip′sin), a. [< gypse, gypsum, + -ine[1].] Same as gypseous.

gypsisme†, n. See gipsism.

gypsography (jip-sog′ra-fi), n. [< Gr. γύψος, chalk, gypsum, + γράφειν, write.] 1. The art or practice of engraving, as inscriptions, upon natural gypsum in some one of its forms, as alabaster.—2. The art or practice of engraving on casts of plaster of Paris. [Rare in both senses.]

gypsologist, gypsology. See gipsologist, gipsology.

Gypsophila (jip-sof′i-lä), n. [NL., < Gr. γύψος, chalk, gypsum, + φίλος, loving.] A genus of the family Silenaceæ, allied to the pinks (Dianthus), of about 50 species, widely distributed in the old world. They are slender, graceful herbs, with numerous very small panicled flowers. G. paniculata and G. elegans are often cultivated for ornament.

gypsous (jip′sus), a. Containing or resembling lime or plaster.

Others looked for it [the cause of sweating sickness] from the earth, as arising from an exhalation in moist weather out of gipsous or plaisterly ground.
Fuller, Cambridge University, vii. 36.

★gypsum (jip′sum), n. [Formerly also gypse, gipse; < OF. gipse, gypse, F. gypse = Sp. gipso = Pg. gypso = It. gesso, plaster, < L. gypsum, neut., < Gr. γύψος, fem., chalk, gypsum; prob. of Eastern origin: cf. Pers. jabsīn, lime, Ar. jibs, jibsīn, plaster, gypsum.] Native hydrous sulphate of calcium, a mineral usually of a white color, but also gray, yellow, red, and when impure brown or black. It is soft and easily scratched; the crystalline varieties, called selenite, are generally perfectly transparent, and cleave readily, yielding thin flexible folia. The crystals are frequently twinned, and often have an arrow-head form. The massive varieties are fibrous (satin-spar), foliated, lamellar-stellate, granular to impalpable. The fine-grained pure white or delicately colored variety is called alabaster, and is used for ornamental purposes; the impure earthy kind, when reduced to the anhydrous form by heat, is called plaster of Paris, and is used extensively for making molds, etc. (See plaster.) Gypsum ground to a powder is used as a fertilizer.

The Ethiopian warriors were painted half with gypsum and half with minium.
C. O. Müller, Manual of Archæol. (trans.), § 231.

Gypsy, gypsydom, etc. See Gipsy, etc.

Gyptian†, n. See Gipsen.

gyra (jī′ra), n.; pl. gyræ (-rē). [ML., fem., < L. gyrus, m., a circle: see gyre.] In medieval and ecclesiastical costume, a hem or border richly decorated with embroidery or applied ornament of any kind.

gyral (jī′ral), a. [< gyre + -al.] 1. Whirling; moving in a circle; rotating.—2. In anat., pertaining to a gyrus or to the gyri of the brain.

gyrant (jī′rant), a. [< L. gyran(t-)s, ppr. of gyrare, turn round: see gyrate.] Turning round a central point; gyrating. Formerly also girant.

gyrate (jī′rāt), v. i.; pret. and pp. gyrated, ppr. gyrating. [< L. gyratus, pp. of gyrare, tr. and intr., turn round, whirl, < gyrus, a circle: see gyre, n.] To turn round; wheel; rotate; whirl; move round a fixed point. See gyration. Formerly also girate.

Waters of vexation filled her eyes, and they had the effect of making the famous Mr. Merdle . . . appear to leap . . . and gyrate, as if he were possessed by several Devils.
Dickens, Little Dorrit, ii. 24.

They gyrated in couples, a few at a time, throwing their bodies into the most startling attitudes and the wildest contortions. G. W. Cable, The Grandissimes, p. 246.

gyrate (jī′rāt), a. [< L. gyratus, pp.: see the verb.] 1. In bot., curved inward like a crozier; circinate.—2. In zoöl., having convolutions like the gyri of the brain; meandrine, as a coral. See cut under brain-coral.

By this serial growth the corallum becomes "gyrate" or "meandrine"; and excellent examples may be found in the genera Meandrina, Diploria, etc.
Encyc. Brit., VI. 373.

★gyration (jī-rā′shon), n. [< ML. gyratio(n-), < L. gyrare, gyrate: see gyrate.] A wheeling; whirling; revolution; a wheeling motion, like that of the moon round the earth. Specifically—(a) A revolution round a distant center combined with a simultaneous rotation in the same direction round the gyrating body's center. (b) A whirling motion, a rotary motion of a massive body, with the thought of its vis viva. (c) A motion like that of a gyroscope, a conical rotation of an axis of rotation. (d) Any motion of a body with one point fixed.

If a burning coal be nimbly moved round in a circle with gyrations, continually repeated, the whole circle will appear like fire. Newton, Opticks.

When the sun so enters a hole or window that by its illumination the atomes or moats become perceptible, if then by our breath the ayr be gently impelled, it may be perceived that they will circularly returne and in a gyration unto their places again.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 4.

A French top, browne from a cord which was wound about it, will stand as it were fixt on the floor [where] it lighted, and yet continue in its repeated gyrations.
Glanville, Vanity of Dogmatizing, ix.

He and Blanche, whilst executing their rapid gyrations, came bolt up against the heavy dragoon.
Thackeray, Pendennis, xxvi.

Center of gyration, a point in a revolving body such that, if all the matter of the body could be collected at that point, the body would continue to revolve with the same energy as when its parts were in their original places.—Ellipsoid of gyration. See ellipsoid.—Radius of gyration, the distance of the center of gyration from the axis of rotation.

gyrational (jī-rā′shon-al), a. [< gyration + -al.] Of, pertaining to, or characterized by gyration: as, the gyrational movements of the planets. R. A. Proctor.

gyratory (jī′rā-tō-ri), a. [= F. giratoire, gyratoire; as gyrate + -ory.] Moving in a circle or spirally; gyrating.

gyrde[1]†, v. See girdl[1].

gyrde[2]†, v. See girdl[2].

gyrdel†, n. See girdle[1].

gyre (jīr), n. [Formerly also gire (ME. ger, gere, < OF. gere, gire); = Sp. giro = Pg. gyro = It. giro, < L. gyrus, a circuit, ring, < Gr. γῦρος, a circle, ring; cf. γυρός, a., round.] 1. A circle or ring; a revolution of a moving body; a circular or spiral turn.

She, rushing through the thickest preasse, Perforce disparted their compacted gyre.
Spenser, F. Q., III. i. 23.

Dispersed the armed gire
With which I was environed.
Massinger, Picture, ii. 2.

Morn by morn the lark
Shot up and shrill'd in flickering gyres.
Tennyson, Princess, vii.

2. In anat., a gyrus: as, a cerebral gyre.

gyre†, v. [< ME. giren, < L. gyrare, turn, < gyrus, a circle: see gyre, n., and gyrate.] I. intrans. To turn; gyrate; revolve.

Which from their proper orbs not go,
Whether they gyre swift or slow.
Drayton, Eclogues, ii.

II. trans. To turn.

September is with Aprill houres even,
For Phebus like in either gireth heven.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 186.

gyre-carlin (gīr'kär″lin), n. [Sc., also written gyre-carline, gyre-carling, gy-carlin, gay-carlin, etc.; < Icel. gýgr (pl. gýgjar) = Norw. gjure, a witch, an ogress, + Icel. karlinna, > Sc. carlin, q. v.] A hag; a witch.

There is a bogle or a brownie, a witch or gyre-carline, a bodach or a fairy in the case.
Scott, Chronicles of Canongate, viii.

gyrefull† (jīr'fûl), a. [< gyre + -ful. Cf. gerful.] Abounding in gyres or spiral turns; revolving; encircling.

Suche posters may be likened well vnto the carters oulde Of forayne worlde, on Mount Olimpe whose carts when they were rould
With gyrefull sway, by coursers swifte, to winne the glistring branche, etc. Drant, tr. of Horace's Satires, i. 2.

Gyrencephala (jir-en-sef'a-lă), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. γῦρος, a ring, circle, + ἐγκέφαλος, the brain.] In Owen's system (1857), one of four prime divisions of mammalians, containing the orders Cetacea, Sirenia, Hyracoidea, Proboscidea, Ungulata, Carnivora, and Quadrumana, having more or less numerous cerebral gyri, and the hemispheres of the cerebrum extending more or less over the cerebellum and olfactory lobes of the brain: distinguished from Archencephala, Lissencephala, and Lyencephala. The division represents the higher series of mammals called by Bonaparte Educabilia and by Dana Meyasthena, but differs in excluding man. [Not in use.]

gyrencephalate (jir-en-sef'a-lāt), a. [As Gyrencephala + -ate[1].] Same as gyrencephalous.

gyrencephalous (jir-en-sef'a-lus), a. [As Gyrencephala + -ous.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Gyrencephala. See cut under gyrus.

gyrfalcon (jėr'fâ″kn), n. See gerfalcon.

gyri, n. Plural of gyrus.

Gyrinidæ (ji-rin'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Gyrinus + -idæ.] A family of hydradephagous beetles, the whirligigs, so called from their habit of gyrating together on the water. The metasternum has no antecoxal piece, but is prolonged in a triangular process posteriorly; the antennæ are irregular and very short; the abdomen has 7 segments, and there are 4 eyes, the upper pair of which look into the air, and the lower into the water. When disturbed they eject an odorous fluid. The larvæ breathe by pairs of ciliate gills, one on each side of each of the abdominal segments, and the gills serve also as swimming-organs. Also called Gyrinida, Gyrinides, Gyrinites, and Gyrinoidea.

Whirligig (Dineutes vittatus), one of the Gyrinidæ. (Line shows natural size.)

Gyrinus (ji-rī'nus), n. [NL., < Gr. γυρῖνος or γύρινος, a tadpole, porwiggle (so called from its round shape), < γυρός, round: see gyre, n.] A genus of water-beetles, typical of the family Gyrinidæ, having the scutellum distinct.

gyrlandt, n. and v. An obsolete form of garland.

Their hair . . . gyrlanded with sea grasse.
B. Jonson, Masque of Blackness.

gyrlet, n. See girl.

gyroceran (ji-ros'e-ran), a. Resembling or related to the genus Gyroceras. A. Hyatt.

Gyroceras (ji-ros'e-ras), n. [NL., < Gr. γυρός, round, + κέρας, a horn.] The typical genus of Gyroceratidæ. Goldfuss. Also Gyroceratites, Gyroceras.

Gyroceras goldfussi.

Gyroceratidæ (jir-ō-se-rat'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Gyroceras (-at-) + -idæ.] A family of nautiliform shells of a discoidal shape, in which the last whorl is parallel with the others, all being unconnected.

gyroceratite (jir-ō-ser'a-tīt), n. A fossil cephalopod of the family Gyroceratidæ.

gyroceratitic (jir-ō-ser-a-tit'ik), a. [< gyroceratite + -ic.] Resembling the Gyroceratidæ; having unconnected whorls, as a fossil cephalopod.

The loosely coiled [shell] but with whorls not in contact, gyroceratitic. Science, III. 123.

gyrodactyli, n. Plural of gyrodactylus, 2.

Gyrodactylidæ (jir″ō-dak-til'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Gyrodactylus + -idæ.] A family of very small viviparous trematode worms with strong hooks and large terminal caudal disk. They are produced one at a time, and within each, before it is born, another of a second generation may be formed, and in this again a third.

Gyrodactylus (jir-ō-dak'ti-lus), n. [NL. (Nordmann), < Gr. γυρός, round, + δάκτυλος, finger.] 1. The typical genus of trematode worms of the family Gyrodactylidæ. G. elegans is found in the gills of fishes.—2. [l. c.; pl. gyrodactyli (-lī).] An individual or a species of this genus.

gyrogonite (ji-rog'ō-nīt), n. [< Gr. γυρός, round, + γόνος, seed, + -ite[2].] A petrified spiral spermocarp of plants of the genus Chara, found in fresh-water deposits, and formerly supposed to be a shell.

gyroidal (jī-roi'dal), a. [< Gr. γυροειδής, like a circle, < γῦρος, a circle, + εἶδος, form.] Spiral in arrangement or in movement. (a) In crystal., having certain planes arranged spirally, so that they incline all to the right or all to the left of a vertical line. (b) In optics, turning the plane of polarization circularly or spirally to the right or left.

gyroma (ji-rō'mă), n.; pl. gyromata (-ma-tă). [< Gr. as if γύρωμα*, < γυροῦν, make round, bend, < γυρός, round: see gyre.] 1. A turning round.—2. In bot., the shield of lichens. Imp. Dict.

gyromancy (jir'ō-man-si), n. [= F. gyromancie, < Gr. γῦρος, a circle, + μαντεία, divination.] A kind of divination said to have been practised by walking round in a circle or ring until the performer fell from dizziness, the manner of his fall being interpreted with reference to characters or signs previously placed about the ring, or in some such way.

gyromata, n. Plural of gyroma.

gyron, giron (jī'ron), n. [< F. giron, a gyron, so called in reference to the arrangement of gyrons round the fesse-point; < Gr. γῦρος, a ring, circle: see gyre.] In her., a bearing consisting of two straight lines drawn from any given part of the field and meeting in an acute angle in the fesse-point. It usually issues from the dexter chief, and is considered to occupy one half of the first quarter; but if otherwise, its position must be stated in the blazon.

gyrondola†. A variant of girandole.

gyronnetty, gironnetty, a. False forms (as if from a French gironnetté, defined as 'finished at the top with points') for girouetté, 'furnished with a weathercock.'

gyronny, gironny (jī'ro-ni), a. [Heraldic F. gyronné*, gironné, < gyron, q. v.] In her., divided into a number of triangular parts of two different tinctures. The points of all the triangles meet at the fesse-point. The number of triangles must be stated in the blazon: as, gyronny of eight, or and gules. Also written gironné.

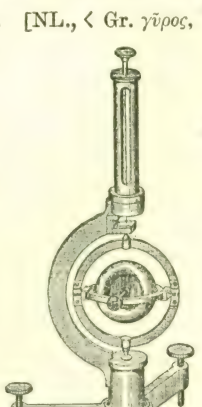
Gyronny of eight, gules and argent.



Gyronny, covered with gyrons, or divided so as to form several gyrons; said of an escutcheon.
Booke of Precedence (E. E. T. S., extra ser.), i. 116.

gyronwise, gironwise (jī'ron-wīz), adv. In her., in the direction of the lines forming a field gyronny—that is, radiating from the fesse-point.

Gyrophora (jī-rof'ō-rä), n. [NL., < Gr. γῦρος, a circle, + -φόρος, < φέρειν = E. bear[1].] A genus of lichens, one of which is the tripe-de-roche.

gyrophoric (jir-ō-for'ik), a. [< Gyrophora + -ic.] Belonging to or derived from plants of the genus Gyrophora: as, gyrophoric acid.

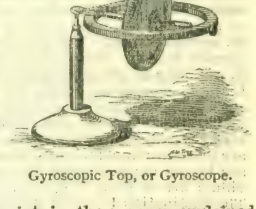
gyroscope (jī'rō-skōp), n. [= F. gyroscope, a name given in 1852 by Foucault to his improved form of Bohnenberger's apparatus, < Gr. γῦρος, a circle, + σκοπεῖν, view.] An instrument consisting of a fly-wheel, the axis of which can turn freely in any direction, designed to illustrate the dynamics of rotating bodies.



Foucault's Gyroscope.

The instrument commonly called gyroscope is better named gyroscopic top (which see, under gyroscopic). The gyroscope proper of Foucault, shown in the figure, consists of a fly-wheel having the small conical bearings of its axis in a well-balanced metallic ring which carries two knife-edges in a line perpendicular to the axis of the fly-wheel; these knife-edges bear upon agates carried in a horizontal plane by an outer vertical ring half suspended from a small copper wire and turning about a vertical axis. The axis of the wheel can thus turn in any direction. By means of an accessory apparatus a velocity of 150 turns a second can be imparted to the fly-wheel. The principal experiments with this apparatus are as follows: First experiment.—If, when the fly-wheel is turning rapidly, no considerable force is applied to change the direction of its axis, its direction will remain almost unchanged. For, suppose it were proposed, by an instantaneous impulse, to turn this axis round a fixed axis perpendicular to it; then, at the point where this fixed axis cuts the rim of the fly-wheel, a particle would have to be deflected, and it can be shown by the parallelogram of motions that a velocity must be communicated to it proportional to the velocity it already possessed. Hence, the force required to rotate the axis of a fly-wheel increases with its velocity. Accordingly, when the velocity is very high, the friction on the bearings will change the direction of the axis but very little. But all the surrounding objects partake of the rotation of the earth upon its axis. Consequently, the axis of the fly-wheel will have a relative rotation; and this may be observed with a microscope. Second experiment.—If the fly-wheel was attached to its axis by a hinge, so that its plane was free to take any inclination to the axis, it is plain that by virtue of centrifugal force it would become perpendicular to the axis, since in this way its particles would be furthest from the axis. If then the outer ring of the gyroscope be held fast in such a position that the axis of the fly-wheel is free to move in the meridian plane, it partakes of the rotation of the earth; and the rotation of the earth and that of the fly-wheel being compounded, the axis of resultant rotation is not quite perpendicular to the fly-wheel. Accordingly, the inner ring will turn on its knife-edges until the axis of the fly-wheel is brought into parallelism with that of the earth, so that the wheel revolves from west to east like the earth. Third experiment.—On the same principle, if the outer ring be free to turn, but the inner one be fixed horizontally, the outer ring will turn so as to bring the axis of the fly-wheel into the meridian. Fourth experiment.—Let the inner wheel be thrown out of balance by hanging a weight upon it near one end of the axis; then this weight will each instant communicate a rotation about the knife-edges, compounding itself with the rotation of the fly-wheel about its axis as the rotation of the earth does in the third experiment, and a rotation of the outer ring round its vertical axis will result. Since the resultant axis of the first two rotations is very near that of the fly-wheel, the tendency of the weight to fall will be but slight, and under the influence of the centrifugal force of the third rotation it will move like a conical pendulum.—Gyroscope governor, a steam-governor in which a gyroscope is employed as a regulator. A change in the speed of the engine causes a heavy gyroscope to change its plane of rotation, this change in turn controlling the speed of the engine. See governor.

gyroscopic (jī-rō-skop'ik), a. [< gyroscope + -ic.] Pertaining to the gyroscope; illustrating the dynamical laws of rotation.

The bearings are of great length and large diameter to stand the gyroscopic action which occurs in a heavy sea on board ship. The Engineer, LXVI. 364.

Gyroscopic pendulum, an instrument consisting of two pieces, of which the first is attached to one of the axes of a universal flexure joint, the other axis being held fixed; while the second piece is jointed to the first by an axis parallel to the fixed axis of the universal flexure joint. —Gyroscopic top, an instrument consisting of a heavy fly-wheel revolving about an axis one point of which is fixed, but which is otherwise free to move in any way. The fly-wheel being set in rotation, the axis moves about the fixed point in the manner explained under gyroscope, fourth experiment.

Gyroscopic Top, or Gyroscope.

gyrose (jī'rōs), a. [< L. gyrus, a circle (see gyre), + -ose.] In bot., turned round like a crook; bent to and fro; folded and waved or marked with wavy lines: applied to some anthers and to flexuosities of the margin of the apothecium of certain lichens, as Umbilicaria.

gyrostat (jī'rō-stat), n. [< Gr. γυρός, round, γῦρος, a circle, + στατικός, stationary: see static.] An instrument for illustrating the dynamics of rotation, composed of a box or case having a sharp bearing-edge in the form of a regular polygon, and containing a fly-wheel having its center and its direction of rotation in the plane of the bearing-edge.

Gyrostat.

gyrostatic (jī-rō-stat'-ik), a. [As gyrostat + -ic.] Connected with the dynamical principle that a rotating body tends to preserve its plane of rotation.

A system of four gyrostatic masses connected together by links was shown to possess all the properties of an ordinary elastic spring, although composed of matter in itself entirely devoid of elasticity.

Sir W. Thomson, quoted in Science, IV. 249.

gyrovagi (jī-rov'ā-jī), n. pl. [ML., ⟨ L. gyrus, a circle, + vagus, wandering.] In the early church, vagrant monks without definite occupation, who subsisted upon the charity of others.

Gyrovagi, vagrant tramps who even at that time [528], as more than a century earlier, continued to bring discredit on the monastic profession. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 704.

★gyrus (jī'rus), n.; pl. gyri (-rī). [L., NL., ⟨ Gr. γῦρος, a circle, circuit, ring; cf. γυρός, round: see gyre.] In anat., one of the rounded ridges into which the surface of the cerebral hemisphere is divided by the fissures or sulci; a convolution; a gyre. The gyri and sulci are complementary and mutually definitive. They are most numerous and best marked in the brain of the higher mammals (which are therefore called gyrencephalous), and especially in that of man. Every gyrus in man has its own name; but several different systems of naming are in vogue, and the nomenclature is still shifting. The attempt to identify the human gyri and sulci with those of other mammals encounters difficulties which have thus far been insurmountable except in the cases of the most constant and best-marked folds and fissures. (See the cuts.) Additional difficulty is encountered in the fact that different human brains vary in details of the gyri, and the same brain may differ on its opposite sides. The principal gyri are noted in the phrases below. The gyri represent an enormous increase in quantity of the gray cortical matter or cortex of the brain in comparison with the actual superficies of the cerebral hemispheres, some of the folds being separated by fissures an inch or more in depth, and containing three layers of gray matter with three layers of white. The gyri are to some extent an indication of intellectual power, and are better marked when the mental powers of the individual are at their height than in infancy and senility. The distinction between gyrus and lobe or lobule, as applied to lesser divisions of the surface of the brain, is not always preserved. Gyrus is exactly synonymous with convolution.—Angular gyrus, a certain gyrus of the hemisphere of the brain in man and monkeys. In man it is the short gyrus arching over the upper extremity of the superior temporal fissure, the hindmost one of four parietal gyri, separated by a short vertical sulcus from the supramarginal gyrus. See fig. 3, and cut under cerebral.—Annectent gyrus, a small or secondary fold, which may connect larger or primary convolutions: especially applied to several such gyri of the occipital lobe, as those forming the connections of the cuneus or occipital lobule. See cut under cerebral.—Arched gyri, four arched convolutions regularly arranged, in some carnivorous animals, as the dog and wolf, beginning with one which borders the Sylvian fissure and ending with one which forms the margin of the cerebral hemisphere. They are enumerated from first to fourth, as by Leuret, or in reverse order (Ferrier), or only three are recognized (Flower), when they are also called inferior, middle, and superior (Mivart).—Ascending frontal gyrus, the gyrus bounding the fissure of Rolando in front. Also called the anterior central gyrus and transverse frontal gyrus. See cut under cerebral.—Ascending parietal gyrus, the gyrus bounding the fissure of Rolando behind. Also called the posterior central convolution.—Callosal gyrus, a convolution of the median surface of the cerebrum immediately over the corpus callosum and below the callosomarginal fissure. It is continuous behind with the gyrus hippocampi, and ends in the gyrus uncinatus. Also called convolution of the corpus callosum, and gyrus fornicatus, from its arched or fornicated figure. See cuts under cerebral and sulcus.—Cuneate gyrus, a convolution of the occipital lobe appearing as a wedge-shaped figure on the median aspect of the cerebrum in the fork between the parieto-occipital sulcus and the calcarine sulcus. Also called occipital lobule and cuneus. See cut under cerebral.—External orbital gyrus, that part of the orbital surface which lies outside of the triradiate sulcus. Gray.—Frontal gyri, three gyri which compose the superior and lateral surface of the frontal lobe of the cerebrum, all lying in front of the ascending frontal gyrus. They are defined by the superior and inferior frontal sulci, and by the vertical fissure or precentral sulcus.—Gyrus fornicatus. Same as callosal gyrus.—Gyrus quadratus, the quadrate gyrus.—Hippocampal gyrus, the continuation of the gyrus fornicatus where it dips down behind and below the corpus callosum, and continues forward to the uncinate gyrus: so called from its relation to the hippocampus.—Marginal gyrus. (a) That part of the first frontal convolution which appears on the median side of the hemisphere. See cut under cerebral. (b) The gyrus which arches over the extremity of the fissure of Sylvius. See sulcus.—Occipital gyri, three principal convolutions of the occipital lobe of the cerebrum, separated by two small transverse sulci, and distinguished as first, second, and third, from above downward, or, as in fig. 3, superior, middle, and inferior. See cut under cerebral.—Orbital gyri, the gyri or convolutions upon the under or orbital surface of the frontal lobe of the cerebrum, which rest upon the orbital plate of the frontal bone. They are three in number, directly continuous with and corresponding to the frontal gyri. The two best-marked orbital gyri are sometimes distinguished as the internal and external.—Parietal gyri, four well-marked convolutions upon the superior and lateral surface of the parietal lobe; and especially two of these distinguished as the ascending parietal (or posterior central) and the superior parietal, the other two being commonly known as the supramarginal and the angular gyrus. (See other phrases.) In fig. 3, the superior parietal is called posteroparietal lobule.—Quadrate gyrus, a convolution of somewhat square figure appearing on the median surface of the cerebrum between the callosomarginal sulcus in front and the parieto-occipital sulcus behind, and continuous below with the gyrus fornicatus. Also called quadrate lobule and precuneus. See cut under cerebral.—Sigmoid gyrus, the somewhat S-shaped fold which curves about the lateral end of the cruciate fissure, and whose surface includes several constant and well-marked "motor areas": used especially by English writers.—Temporal gyri, in fig. 3, a general name of the temporal convolutions: usually in human anatomy more fully called temporosphenoidal gyri.—Uncinate gyrus, a convolution which appears on the median surface of the cerebrum nearly opposite the beginning of the gyrus fornicatus. It is so called from its shape, and the hook is known as the crotchet or uncus. See cut under cerebral.

Gyri, or Convolutions.

(Fig. 1 is a lissencephalous brain; figs. 2 and 3 are gyrencephalous.) See also the cuts under brain.

gyset†, n. and v. See guise.

gyst[1]†, n. A Middle English form of guest.

gyst[2]†, n. An obsolete form of gist, now joist.

gyst[3]†, n. An obsolete form of gest[2].

gyst-ale, n. [Appar. ⟨ gyst[1], obs. var. of guest, + ale; but appar. also associated with guise, with allusion to festive mummery.] See the extract.

In Lancashire, we find the term Gyst-ale, which seems to be one of the corruptions of disguising, as applied to mumming, and in this sense the entire name, Gyst-ale, is confirmatory of Mr. Douce's observations. Gyst-ale or guising, says Mr. Baines, was celebrated in Eccles with much rustic splendor at the termination of the marling season, when the villagers, with a king at their head, walked in procession with garlands, to which silver plate was attached, which was contributed by the principal gentry in the neighbourhood.

Hampson, Medii Ævi Kalendarium, I. 283.

gyte[1] (gīt), a. [Origin unknown.] Crazy; ecstatic; senselessly extravagant; delirious; distracted. Also gite. [Scotch.]

What between courts o' law and courts o' state, and upper and under parliaments, . . . here and in London, the gudeman's gane clean gyte.

Scott, Heart of Mid-Lothian, xxiv.

There's nae soberer man than me in my ordnar; but when I hear the wind blaw in my lug, it's my belief that I gang gyte. R. L. Stevenson, Merry Men.

gyte[2] (gīt), n. [Another form of gait, gayt, etc., for get[1], n., offspring, a child: see get[1], n.] 1. A child: generally in contempt.—2. A first year's pupil in the High School of Edinburgh. [Scotch in both senses.]

gytrash (gī'trash), n. [Origin obscure.] A spirit or ghost. [Prov. Eng.]

I remembered certain of Bessie's tales, wherein figured a North-of-England spirit called a "Gytrash"; which, in the form of horse, mule, or large dog, haunted solitary ways, and sometimes came upon belated travellers. . . . Close down by the hazel stems glided a great dog, whose black and white color made him a distinct object against the trees. It was exactly one mask of Bessie's Gytrash—a lion-like creature with long hair and a huge head.

Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, xii.

gyve (jīv), v. t.; pret. and pp. gyved, ppr. gyving. [Also written give; ⟨ ME. given, gyven, fetter, ⟨ gyves, gives, pl., fetters: see gyves.] To fetter; shackle; chain; manacle. [Poetic or archaic.]

I will gyve thee in thine own courtship.

Shak., Othello, ii. 1.

She had gyved
Them so in chains of darkness, as no might Should loose them thence.

B. Jonson, Masque of Beauty.

One hair of thine more vigour doth retain
To bind thy foe, than any iron chain:
Who might be gyv'd in such a golden string,
Would not be captive, though he were a king.

Drayton, Black Prince to Countess of Salisbury.

gyves (jīvz, formerly gīvz), n. pl. [Also gives, formerly guives, guyves, rarely in sing. gyve, give, guive; ME. gives, gyves, ⟨ AF. guive*, give, ⟨ AS. withthe, ME. witthe, withe, wythe, E. withe, with, a twig, band, withe: see withe. For the changes, compare guise, ⟨ wise[2], and chive[1], ⟨ chithe. The word survives only as a book-word; hence the archaic spelling (with y) and the false pronunciation (jīvz for gīvz).] Shackles; fetters. [Poetic or archaic.]

With feteres ant with gyves i chot he wes to-drowe.

Execution of Sir Simon Fraser (Child's Ballads, VI. 281).

I thought
Gyves and the mill had tamed thee.

Milton, S. A., l. 1093.

And Eugene Aram walked between,
With gyves upon his wrist.

Hood, Dream of Eugene Aram.

★ H, 1. The eighth letter and sixth consonant in the English alphabet. The written character comes, like A, B, etc. (see A), from the Phenician, through the Greek and Latin; and it had the same place in the Phenician and Latin alphabets as in the English, though made seventh in order in the Greek by the later omission of the F-sign. The comparative scheme of the letter-forms is as follows:

Egyptian. Hieroglyphic. Hieratic. Phenician. Early Greek and Latin.

The sound belonging to the character in Phenician was that of a rough guttural spirant, nearly like the ch in German, or in Scotch loch (marked in this dictionary ch). In the Greek alphabet it had at first the kindred but weaker value of our h; and with this value it passed over to Italy, and so continued there; but in Greece it came later to be used as a long e (down to that time long and short e had been written alike E), the h-sound being indicated by a half H, namely ⊢, afterward reduced to ⊏ and ', which last then retained the h-value, or that of the "rough breathing," so called, now usually printed '. Our h-sound is called the "aspiration," as being a near approach to pure unmodified breathing, an audible emission of breath before a vowel or semivowel, made, in every case, in the same position of the mouth-organs as that required by the following sound. That is, the h of ha is made in the mouth-position of a, the utterance in the combination changing only from unintonated to intonated breath; that of he is made in the mouth-position of ee; and so with ho, and so on. Thus, the h before each different vowel represents a different product, and h signifies a sort of common surd to all the vowels as sonants; and, being dependent always for its special character upon the following sound, it is very suitably written by the Greeks with a subordinate sign prefixed to the vowel. In English the aspiration occurs before all the vowels, and also before the semivowels w and y, as in whit (that is, hwit) and hue (that is, hyu), though in these cases some authorities hold that the w- and y-sounds themselves are not uttered, but only the h-sound, this being what it would be if the semivowel were really pronounced. This view may in part depend upon an actual difference of pronunciation, but is more probably an error of apprehension and analysis; certainly, in our ordinary utterance, whit is to hoo-it precisely as wit is to oo-it. In older English our h-sound was pronounced also before r and l, as in AS. hring, E. ring, AS. hrīm, E. rime[2], AS. hrōf, E. roof, AS. hlāf, E. loaf, AS. hlid, E. lid, AS. hliehhan, E. laugh, etc.; in other languages it is found also before m and n. The English h in the Teutonic part of the language comes from an original surd guttural, a k, which first became a guttural spirant (= ch in German, or in Scotch loch), and was then further weakened to a mere aspiration. The spirant becomes mere aspiration when its production ceases to be accompanied with a constriction at the top of the throat, causing a rough fricative sound, and so giving a specific character to the utterance. A guttural mute was changed to a spirant also in the interior of many of our words, and was formerly written with h: thus, AS. niht, E. night; but it has long been lost in pronunciation, after being written with gh instead of h (the g never pronounced). The aspiration, indeed, being the weakest and least positive of alphabetic sounds, is especially liable to become silent. The Latin initial h was totally silent in the vernacular forms which emerged as Old French and Italian, and in the earliest Old French, as still in Italian, it does not appear in writing. The earliest Old French words, therefore, having original Latin h, were transferred into Middle English without h, as abit, able, eir, onest, onor, onur, oure, ure, etc., through similar Old French forms from Latin habi'tus, habilis, heres, honestus, honor, hora, etc. In later Old French and Middle English the pedantic habit of imitating the spelling of the original Latin, if known, led to the general restoration of h in these words, a restoration completed in modern French, though the h has remained always unpronounced in French, and, in the oldest and most familiar words, in English. The h now appears in the modern forms of all the above words, and others (except able and arbor[2], the restored forms hable, harbor[2], having died out), namely, unpronounced in heir, honest, honor, hour, etc., and pronounced (by conformity to later words) in habit, heretic, etc., while in some, as herb, humble, etc., the pronunciation wavers between the earlier unaspirated form and the later aspirated form. The confusion existing in such cases led to some variation in the spelling of words originally and properly beginning with a vowel, the h, though not pronounced, being often erroneously inserted in writing, as in habandon, habound, habundance, etc., for abandon, abound, abundance, etc. A similar confusion extended to words of Anglo-Saxon or other Teutonic origin, the h being dropped sometimes where it should appear, and, more often, inserted where it should not appear, as hape for ape, his for is, etc. This confusion characterizes the present pronunciation of the London cockney. The habitual omission of h is, however, quite common even in educated speech in certain positions, and even where usually uttered it is apt to be lost after a final consonant in rapid and easy speaking. In the pronouns he, him, her, when unaccented, as they usually are after another word, the h is almost universally omitted in colloquial speech, an omission long recognized in the common spelling of the related neuter pronoun hit, now always written and pronounced it, and in the colloquial plural hem, now written 'em. The h forms a number of digraphs, or compound characters, some of them of great importance and frequency. The origin of this practice goes back to the earliest Greek period, when the so-called aspirates were real aspirates—that is, mutes with an audible bit of flatus expelled after them: kh nearly as in backhouse, th as in boat-hook, ph as in haphazard. The sounds were at first so written in Greek, with an h after each mute; later, simple characters were devised to take the place of these combinations. But in Greek words carried into Italy the spelling with h was kept up: thus, chorus, theatrum, philosophus; then, in the change of these aspirates to spirants, unitary values were won by the digraphs; and the use of th, especially with spirant value (thin, that), was widely extended to the Teutonic part of our language. The digraph sh comes by alteration of the k of sk to a spirant, and its fusion with the sibilant, making a more palatal sibilant. The origin of our gh (always either silent or pronounced as f), by graphic change from earlier h, has been stated above. (See also under G.) Finally, rh is found in Greek words, as rhetoric, and represents an r with preceding aspiration, as in AS. hring (whence it should properly be written hr, as hw for wh); but the aspiration is always lost in our utterance. For the name of the letter, see aitch.

2. As a medieval numeral, 200, and with a dash over it, thus, H̄, 200,000.—3. As a symbol: (a) In German musical nomenclature, the key, tone, or note elsewhere called B—that is, B natural. (b) In analytic mech., the total energy. (c) In chem., the symbol of hydrogen.

4. As an abbreviation: (a) Hour. (b) Horizontal force—that is, the horizontal component of the earth's magnetic attraction. (c) His or Her, as in H. M. S., His (Her) Majesty's ship or service; H. R. H., His (Her) Royal Highness. (d) In a ship's log-book h. indicates hail. (e) In orchestral scores and arrangements H. indicates horns.

ha[1] (hä), interj. [Also hah; D. G. Sw. Dan. F. Sp. Pg. It., etc., ha, L. ha, a natural utterance, the same as ah (q. v.) with aspiration; its significance depends on the mode of utterance. Repeated, ha ha, ha-ha, AS. D. Sw. OFries., etc., ha ha, L. ha ha, Gr. ἁ ἁ, Hind. hā hā, etc., it usually indicates laughter. Cf. haw[5].] 1. An exclamation denoting surprise, wonder, joy, or other sudden emotion, as suspicion, and also interrogation. Repeated, ha! ha! it expresses either intensified surprise, etc., or laughter.

Interjections? Why, then, some be of laughing, as ha! ha! he! Shak., Much Ado, iv. 1.

Have you eyes?
Could you on this fair mountain leave to feed,
And batten on this moor? Ha! have you eyes?
Shak., Hamlet, iii. 4.

Who's that? ha!

Fletcher (and another), Sea Voyage, iv. 2.

Hah! how the Laurel, great Apollo's Tree,
And all the Cavern shakes!
Prior, Second Hymn of Callimachus.

2. An involuntary sound marking hesitation in speech, uttered slowly and obscurely, and otherwise represented by er or ur.

ha[1] (hä), n. [< ha[1], interj.] 1. An expression of wonder, surprise, or admiration.—2. An expression of hesitancy in speech.

The shrug, the hum, or ha. Shak., W. T., ii. 1.

ha[1] (hä), v. i. [< ha[1], interj.: cf. haw[5], v.] To make the sound ha, expressing hesitation.

The right hon. gentleman . . . is somewhat prone to be prosy. He hums and has, and harks back to matters he has already discussed.
T. W. Higginson, Eng. Statesmen, p. 252.

ha[2] (hä), n. Same as ha-ha[2], haw-haw[2].

ha[3] (hä, hä), pron. A dialectal variant of he[1].

ha[4], ha'[1] (hâ), n. A Scotch form of hall.

He followed me for seven year
Frae bour out and frae ha'.
Old song. (Jamieson.)

ha[5], ha'[2]. A contraction of have. [Colloq. or dial.]

For me, sister! ha' you found out a wife for me? ha' you? pray speak, ha' you? Brome, Northern Lass.

And I may have my will, ile neither ha' poore scholler nor souldier about the court. Day, Ile of Gulls (1633).

haaf, haff, haf[2] (häf, haf), n. [< Icel. haf = Sw. haf = Norw. haave-net, n. See halve-net.

hab† (hab), n. [A noun assumed from hab-or-nab, q. v.] A venture; a chance.

Take heed, for I speak not by habs and by nabs.
Middleton, Spanish Gypsy, iii. 2.

hab (hab), v. t. [ME. habbe: see have.] A variant of have. It exists in the phrase-words hab-nab, hab-or-nab, and also independently as a negro corruption of have.

hab. In zoöl., the regular abbreviation of habitat, 1.

Habassin† (ha-bas'in), a. [A var. of Abassine, Abyssine, obs. forms equiv. to Abyssinian.] Same as Abyssinian.

Among these [the peoples of the Eastern and South-East Churches] the Russe and the Habassin Emperors are the greatest. Howell, Letters, ii. 9.

habbet, v. t. A Middle English form of have.

habber (hab'ėr), v. i. [Sc., also happle; < D. haperen, falter, hesitate, = G. hapern, dial. happeln = Sw. happla, stutter, hesitate, freq., the simple form being seen in Dan. happe, stutter.] To stutter; stammer.

habber (hab'ėr), n. [< habber, v.] A stutter; a stammer. [Scotch.]

habberjont†, n. An obsolete form of haubergeon.

hab. corp. An abbreviation of habeas corpus.

habeas corpus (hā'bē-as kôr'pus). [So called ★from the mandatory words in the writ (in Latin), habeas corpus . . . , 'have the body' (of such a one: sc. brought into court): habeas, 2d pers. sing. subj. (with impv. force) of habere, have; corpus, body: see habit, have, and corpus, corpse.] In law, a writ issued by a judge or court, requiring the body of a person to be brought before the judge or into the court; specifically, such a writ (entitled in full habeas corpus subjiciendum) requiring the body of a person restrained of liberty to be brought before the judge or into court, that the lawfulness of the restraint may be investigated and determined. The right to freedom from restraint without regular legal process, which had always existed at common law, was affirmed by Magna Charta; but arbitrary imprisonment was practised by despotic kings and compliant courts till the latter part of the reign of Charles I., and still occasionally till the passage of the Habeas Corpus Act (which see, below) in that of Charles II. The right to the writ in special cases can still be suspended by legislative authority, both in Great Britain and in the United States, in a time of war or great public danger.

The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it.
Constitution of U. S., Art. i., § 9.

It was considered a duty to authorize the Commanding-General, in proper cases, according to his discretion, to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, or, in other words, to arrest and detain, without resort to the ordinary processes and forms of law, such individuals as he might deem dangerous to the public safety.
Lincoln, in Raymond, p. 143.

Habeas Corpus Act, an English statute of 1679 (31 Car. II., c. 2) regulating the issue and return of writs of habeas corpus and proceedings thereon, the right to which had been previously conceded by the Petition of Right (3 Car. I., c. 1) and the statute of 1640 (16 Car. I., c. 10). There are also statutes of the United States and of the several States, generally modeled upon the British act, securing the like remedy and regulating its exercise.—Habeas corpus ad testificandum, a writ used to bring a prisoner into court to testify as a witness.

2. A usual or customary mode of action; particularly, a mode of action so established by use as to be entirely natural, involuntary, instinctive, unconscious, etc.: used especially of the action, whether physical, mental, or moral, of living beings, and only by extension of that of inanimate things; hence, in general, an individual's custom or usage; also, a natural or more generally an acquired proclivity, disposition, or tendency to act in a certain way.

How use doth breed a habit in a man!
Shak., T. G. of V., v. 4.

Allowing his conclusion that virtues and vices consist in habit, he ought so much the more to have taught the manner of superinducing that habit.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

Power or ability in man of doing any thing, when it has been acquired by frequent doing the same thing, . . . we name habit. Locke, Human Understanding, II. xxii. 10.

Habit . . . comprehends a disposition and something supervening on a disposition. The disposition, which at first was a feebler tendency, becomes, in the end, by custom—that is, by a frequent repetition of exerted energy—a stronger tendency. Disposition is the rude original, habit is the perfect consummation.
Sir W. Hamilton, Metaph., xlii.

By a habit we mean a fixed disposition to do a thing, and a facility in doing it, the result of numerous repetitions of the action. J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 102.

After a sufficient number of repetitions . . . an act becomes a habit, i. e., is performed automatically, or without the intervention of effort, and frequently without consciousness. E. D. Cope, Origin of the Fittest, p. 231.

3†. In logic, a character which can be separated from its subject, without the destruction of the latter.

Sept.*—2. n. In nat. hist., the area or region where an animal or a plant naturally lives or grows; by extension, place of abode in general; habitation. The complete habitat of a species is its geographical range. Applied, as it commonly is, to an individual or a specimen, it is generally distinguished in botany from the station, which refers to the physical conditions surrounding the plant, such as soil, exposure, and elevation. See station.

The members of that [human] stock, spreading into different habitats, fall under different sets of conditions.
H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 338.

Things are good for nothing out of their natural habitat.
Lowell, Fireside Travels, p. 8.

Of course a poet must represent his age and habitat.
Stedman, Poets of America, p. 4.

He [Huxley] describes living creatures by structure. The Mosaic writer describes them by habitat.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVIII. 618.

habitation (hab-i-tā′shọn), n. [< OF. habitation, F. habitation = Pr. Sp. habitacion = Pg. habitação = It. abitazione, < L. habitatio(n-), a dwelling, < habitare, dwell: see habit, v.] 1. The act of inhabiting, or the state of being inhabited; occupancy.

For want of habitation and repair,
Dissolve to heaps of ruins. Sir J. Denham.

For their shipping is of two sorts, one for saile, another for habitation also. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 437.

It [arson] is an offence against that right of habitation which is acquired by the law of nature as well as by the laws of society. Blackstone, Com., IV. xvi.

2. Place of abode; a settled dwelling; a place or structure constituting an abode, as of men or animals.

It was so thikke of busshes and of thornes and breres that noon wolde haue wende [thought] that ther hadde be [been] eny habitacion. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 517.

As imagination bodies forth
The forms of things unknown, the poet's pen Turns them to shapes, and gives to airy nothing
A local habitation and a name. Shak., M. N. D., v. 1.

=Syn. 2. Domicile, quarters.

habitator† (hab′i-tā-tọr), n. [= F. habitateur = Pr. habitaire, habitador = Sp. Pg. habitador = It. abitatore, < L. habitator, < habitare, dwell: see habit, v.] A dweller; an inhabitant.

The longest day in Cancer is longer unto us then that in Capricorn unto the Southern habitator.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., vi. 10.

habit-cloth (hab′it-klôth), n. A light broadcloth especially adapted for women's riding-habits, but often used for other outer garments.

habit-maker (hab′it-mā″kėr), n. One who makes habits; specifically, a maker of women's riding-habits.

habit-shirt (hab′it-shėrt), n. A garment of muslin or similar material worn by women on the neck and shoulders, under the dress, usually having some resemblance to the collar, shirt-bosom, etc., worn by men.

habitual (hā-bit′ū-al), a. [< F. habituel = Pr. Sp. Pg. habitual = It. abituale, < ML. habitualis (pertaining to a habit or dress), < L. habitus, habit: see habit, n. Cf. habituate.] 1. Formed or acquired by, or resulting from, habit, frequent use, or custom.

'Tis given out that you are great schollers, and are skild in the habituall arts, and know their coherences.
Marmion, Fine Companion (1633).

Proverbs are habitual to a Nation.
Selden, Table-Talk, p. 100.

A habitual action has in its uniform undeviating character, as well as in its want of a distinctly conscious element, a quasi-mechanical character, and so resembles reflex and instinctive actions. Hence, . . . habitual actions are often said to be performed "instinctively" or automatically. J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 616.

2. According to or constituting a habit; existing as a habit or a fixed condition; customary; usual; regular: as, the habitual practice of sin; the habitual exercise of forbearance; habitual good or ill health.

Because opinions which are gotten by education, and in length of time are made habitual, cannot be taken away by force, and upon the sudden; they must therefore be taken away also by time and education.
Hobbes, De Corpore Politico, ii. 10.

The habitual scowl of her brow was, undeniably, too fierce, at this moment, to pass itself off on the innocent score of near-sightedness. Hawthorne, Seven Gables, viii.

Deepen the habitual mood
Of my existence. Lowell, Fancy's Casuistry.

In Scotland, during early times, cattle-raids were habitual causes of inter-tribal fights.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 448.

What we call a habitual feeling is one which is habitually or customarily called forth in a calm form by a permanent object of the environment, so as to diffuse itself over large tracts of life in a smooth current.
J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 490.

3. Formed by repeated impressions; rendered permanent by continued causes: as, a habitual color of the skin.—Habitual cognition. See habitual knowledge, under knowledge.—Habitual criminal, knowledge, etc. See the nouns.—Habitual logic. See the extract.

By Objective or Speculative Logic is meant that complement of doctrines of which the science of Logic is made up; by Subjective or Habitual Logic is meant the speculative knowledge of these doctrines which any individual (as Socrates, Plato, Aristotle) may possess, and the practical dexterity with which he is able to apply them.
Sir W. Hamilton, Lectures on Logic, iii.

=Syn. Usual, Customary, Habitual; accustomed, wonted, regular, ordinary, every-day. As habit goes beyond custom in its regularity, so habitual goes beyond usual or customary. Indeed, habitual would now hardly be used where it was not meant that the habit was uniform and unbroken or firmly fixed as an element of character: as, habitual indolence. The other words lead up to this: usual, that which occurs much more often than not; customary, that which occurs in the larger part of all the cases. See custom.

I suppose the red Indian lived here in his usual discomfort, and was as restless as his successors, the summer boarders. C. D. Warner, In the Wilderness, vii.

In 1772 Dean Nowell was appointed to preach the customary sermon before the House on the anniversary of the Restoration. Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., iii.

In the past experiences of the race, smiles and gentle tones in those around have been habitual accompaniments of pleasurable feelings.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 520.

habitually (hā-biṭ′ū-al-i), adv. In a habitual manner; by frequent practice or use; as a habit.

Bad habits must undermine good, and often repeated acts make us habitually evil.
Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., i. 30.

A very large proportion of the population of St. Eustatius were habitually engaged in supplying the Americans with munitions of war. Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., xiv.

habitualness (hā-biṭ′ū-al-nes), n. The state or character of being habitual.

But true perfection . . . consists, as has been shown, in these three things: in the uprightness, the universality, and habitualness of our obedience.
Clarke, Works, II. cxliv.

habituary† (hā-biṭ′ū-ā-ri), a. [< L. habitus (habitu-), habit, + -ary. Cf. habitual.] Habitual. Davies.

Too well he knew how difficult a thing it was to invert the course of Nature, especially being confirm'd by continuance of practice, and made habituary by custom.
E. Fannant (?), Hist. Edward II., p. 3.

habituate (hā-biṭ′ū-āt), v. t.; pret. and pp. habituated, ppr. habituating. [< LL. habituatus, pp. of habituare (> It. abituare = Pr. Sp. Pg. habituar = F. habituer), bring into a condition or habit (of body), < L. habitus, condition, habit: see habit, n.] 1. To accustom; make familiar by habit or customary experience.

A mind long habituated to a certain set of objects insensibly becomes fond of seeing them.
Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, lxxiii.

The action was more frank and fearless than any I was habituated to indulge in; somehow it pleased her.
Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, iv.

2†. To settle as an inhabitant in a place.

Many nobles and gentlemen . . . left their families habituated in these countries.
Sir W. Temple, Int. to Hist. England, ii. 584. (Latham.)

=Syn. 1. To inure, harden, familiarize (with).

habituate† (hā-biṭ′ū-āt), a. [< L. habituatus, pp.: see the verb.] Inveterate by custom; formed by habit; habitual.

So, for all his temporary forbearance, upon some either policy or necessity, the habituate sinner hath not yet given over his habit. Hammond, Works, IV. 679.

The pope's encroachments upon the state of England had been an old sore, and by its eld almost habituate.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 100.

habituation (hā-biṭ-ū-ā′shọn), n. [= F. habituation = Sp. habituación = It. abituazione, < LL. as if habituatio*(n-), < habituare, habituate: see habituate.] The act of habituating, or the state of being habituated.

Every one of us would have felt, sixty years ago, that the general tone and colouring of a style was stiff, bookish, pedantic, which, from the habituation of our organs, we now feel to be natural and within the privilege of learned art. De Quincey, Style, i.

Habituation to pain has limits; and on the other hand our healthy sensations lose freshness and get feeble.
F. H. Bradley, Mind, XIII. 9.

habitude (hab′i-tūd), n. [< F. habitude = Sp. habitud = Pg. habitude = It. abitudine, < L. habitudo, condition, appearance, < habitus, pp. of habere, have, hold, keep: see habit, n.] 1. Customary manner or mode of living, feeling, or acting; habit.

hackberry (hak'ber″i), n.; pl. hackberries (-iz). [An alteration of hagberry, the bird-cherry: see hagberry.] 1. Same as hagberry. Also called bird-cherry.—2. An American tree, Celtis occidentalis, of the family Ulmaceæ, allied to the elm. It ranges from Canada to Florida and west to Texas, but is most typical and abundant in the Mississippi valley. It has a number of well-marked forms, which are regarded by some authors as distinct species; but they appear to be connected by intermediate ones. A smaller species, C. reticulata, occurs from Colorado to Arizona and Texas. The hackberry sometimes becomes a large tree 4 or 5 feet in diameter and 80 or 100 feet high. The wood is white and soft, but heavy, coarse-grained, and not durable; it is used in the manufacture of cheap furniture, but chiefly as fence-timber. The fruit is an edible drupe, of sweetish taste and light-red color, the size of a bird-cherry. Also called nettle-tree, hoop-ash, manyberry, and sugarberry.

Pg. hacanea, Pg. also acanea, OSp. OPg. facanea = It. acchinea, now abbr chinea (ML. hakeneius, hakenetus), cf. MD. hackeneye, D. hakkenei, an ambling horse. Cf. OF. haque (also dim. haquet) = Sp. haca, OSp. OPg. faca, a nag, possibly abbr. from the preceding longer forms (cf. E. hack[4], abbr. from hackney); but the origin and connections of the words are obscure. The Rom. forms suggest a Teut. origin, and may come (through OF.) from MD. The MD. hackeneye is explained by Gesner (in Kilian) from MD. hacken, hakken, chop, the alternate lifting and dropping of the horse's feet in ambling, with the accompanying sound, being compared to the alternating movement of a pair of chopping-knives in chopping cabbage or the like. Skeat, overlooking this explanation, suggests the same hakken in a possible sense 'jolt.' The term. -neye is not clear.] I. n. 1. A horse kept for riding or driving; a pad; a nag.

Furth he rideth vppon his hakeney,

Hades (hā'dēz), n. [Spelled Ades by Milton (P. L., ii. 964); < Gr. Ἄιδης (Ἄιδης), also, and earlier, Ἀΐδης, Doric Ἀΐδας, also nom. Ἀΐς, implied in gen. Ἄϊδος; in Homer only as a personal name, Hades or Pluto, the god of the nether world; later local, the nether world, often merely equiv. to the grave; usually derived from a- priv. + ἰδεῖν, see (= L. videre, see, = AS. witan, know: see vision, wit), as if lit. 'the unseen'; but the earliest use and the later form (with the initial aspirate) are against this.] 1. In Gr. myth.: (a) The lord of the lower world, a brother of Zeus, and the husband of Persephone (Proserpine). He reigned in a splendid palace, and, besides his function of governing the shades of the departed, he was the giver to mortals of all treasures derived from the earth. In art he was represented in a form kindred to that of Zeus and that of Poseidon, and bearing the staff or scepter of authority, usually in company with Persephone. As the god of wealth, he was also called by the Greeks Pluto; and he is the same as the Roman Dis, Orcus, or Tartarus. (b) The invisible lower or subterranean world in which dwelt the spirits of all the dead; the world of shades; the abode of the departed. The souls in Hades were believed to carry on there a counterpart of their material existence, those of the righteous without discomfort, amid the pale, sweet blooms of asphodel, or even in pleasure, in the Elysian Fields, and those of the wicked amid various torments. The lower world was surrounded by fiery and pestilential rivers, and the solitary approach was guarded by the monstrous three-headed dog Cerberus to prevent the shades from escaping to the upper world.

And she went down to Hades, and the gates
That stand forever barred.
Bryant, Odyssey, xi. 340.

In Hades, Achilles thinks of vengeance, and rejoices in the account of his son's success in battle, and the slaughter of his enemies. H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 107.

2. In the Greek New Testament and in the revised English version, the state or abode of the dead indefinitely: often taken as equivalent to purgatory, the intermediate state of the dead, or to hell. See hell.

And I also say unto thee that thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of Hades shall not prevail against it. Mat. xvi. 18 (revised version).

Where the word hades is used to signify the place of either the righteous or the wicked, some qualifying language or circumstances, as in the case of sheol, indicate which part or state of hades is meant.

Hadith (had'ith), n. [Ar. hadith, a saying, legend, tradition.] In Mohammedan theol., the body of traditions relating to Mohammed, now forming a supplement to the Koran, under the name of the Sunna (which see). Originally it was not lawful to commit them to writing, but the danger that they might be lost or corrupted led to the recording of them.

had I wist (had' ī wist'). [< ME. hadde I wist; a phrase used also as a noun. See wist.] Had I known: a phrase indicating regret for something done in ignorance of circumstances now known; hence, as a noun, a lost opportunity; a vain regret.

Quod course of kinde, "What helpith, y wende, Thi wisschinge And thin hadde-y-wist?"
Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 73.

Beware of had-I-wyst, whose fine bringes care and smart.
Paradise of Dayntie Devises, sig. A 3.

A thing overbought hath evermore repentance . . . and had I wist attending upon it.
Holland, tr. of Pliny, xviii. 5.

Most miserable man, whom wicked fate
Hath brought to Court, to sue for had ywist
That few have found, and manie one hath mist!
Spenser, Mother Hub. Tale, l. 893.

hadj, hajj (haj), n. [Ar. hajj, a pilgrimage, < hajja, set out, go on a pilgrimage.] The pilgrimage to Mecca which every free Mohammedan is bound to make, as a religious duty, if possible at least once in his life, in the twelfth month of the Mohammedan year.

The word Hajj is explained by Moslem divines to mean "Kasd," or aspiration, and to express man's sentiment that he is but a wayfarer on earth wending towards another and a nobler world. R. F. Burton, El-Medinah, p. 401.

hadji, hajji (haj'ē), n. [Ar. (and Pers.) hājjī, common form of hājj, a pilgrim, < hajja, go on a pilgrimage: see hadj.] A Mussulman who has performed his hadj, or pilgrimage to Mecca, and who afterward bears the designation as a title of honor: as, Hadji Khalfa. The title is also given to a Greek or an Armenian who has visited the holy sepulcher at Jerusalem. Also spelled hadjee.

The title of Hadji indicates that the bearer has made the pilgrimage to Mecca.
T. B. Aldrich, Ponkapog to Pesth, p. 209, note.

During my stay great throngs of hadjis poured into the town, arriving by the Teheran road. O'Donovan, Merv, x.

Hadrosauridæ (had-rō-sâ'ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hadrosaurus + -idæ.] A family of ornithopod dinosaurian reptiles with teeth in several rows, forming, with use, a tessellated grinding-surface.

Hadrosaurus (had-rō-sâ'rus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἀδρός, thick, stout, bulky, + σαῦρος, a lizard.] A genus of dinosaurian reptiles, typical of the Skeleton of Hadrosaurus foulki.

(Drawn from specimen in Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia, with corrections according to latest discoveries.)

family Hadrosauridæ. The original species of these gigantic iguanodons was H. foulki, from Haddonfield in New Jersey. J. Leidy, 1856.

hadst (hadst). Second person singular of had, preterit of have, contracted from haddest.

hae (hā), v. A Scotch form of have.

hæcceity (hek-sē'i-ti), n. [< ML. hæcceita(t-)s, 'thisness,' < L. hæc, fem. of hic, this: see hic jacet. This word was formed by Duns Scotus about 1300, and was based, as he explained, upon the fem. pronoun because the abstract quality 'thisness' is fem. as being expressed, in L., like other abstract qualities, by a noun with the fem. suffix -ta(t-)s. At a later date the form hicceita(t-)s, < L. hic, m., and the corruption ecceita(t-)s arose, but they never obtained much recognition.] That element of existence which confers individuality upon a nature, according to the Scotists, so that it is in a particular place at a particular time; hereness and nowness. According to the Aristotelian view, matter is the germ of substance and receives forms in its development. But the scholastic doctors considered that the forms were first pure, and then became contracted in some way to individuality. It was early suggested that this was effected by the uniting of the form to matter. But then it was replied that matter is mere being, the most general of all elements. Hence, some supposed that forms were in themselves individual; others that they were individuated by quantity. Scotus maintained that a material substance is made individual, not by its own formal nature, by its quantity, or by its matter, but only by a distinct mode of being, like that which distinguishes a living reality from an idea. This is what he meant by a "positive determining entity," where entity must be distinguished from ens.

Duns Scotus . . . placed the Principle of Individuation in "a certain positive determining entity" which his school called Hœcceity, or thisness.
Whewell, Hist. Induct. Sciences, iv. 4.

A quiddity with no hœcceity. Mind, X. 34.

haekaro (hä'ạ-kä''rō), n. [Maori haekaro.] An evergreen tree, Pittosporum umbellatum, growing in New Zealand, and cultivated for ornament in the Australian colonies and also in England. It attains a height of 30 or 40 feet. It has coriaceous, obovate, bright-green leaves, dull-red flowers in umbels, and a woody capsular fruit of the size of a small hazelnut.

hæm-, hæma-, hæmato-, hæmo-. See hem-, hemato-. [The naturalized English words containing this element, and many words of New Latin form (especially medical terms), are preferably spelled with e.]

Hæmanthus (hē-man'thus), n. [NL., < Gr. αἷμα, blood, + ἄνθος, a flower.] A genus of monocotyledonous bulbous plants, belonging to the family Amaryllidaceæ, tribe Amaryllideæ, and embracing about 30 species, 5 of which are natives of tropical Africa, and the remainder of southern Africa. It is chiefly distinguished from nearly related genera by its 1–2-celled ovary, by the short tube and narrow lobes of the perianth, and by its numerous, often colored, involucral bracts. The corolla of some of the species is of a fine red color, whence the name, and also its English equivalent, blood-plant or blood-lily. The best-known species, H. coccineus, is called the Cape tulip. It is a very showy plant, and its bulbs have diuretic and its fresh leaves antiseptic properties. This species and several others are in cultivation.

Hæmaria (hē-mā'ri-ạ), n. [NL., < Gr. αἷμα, blood, + -aria.] A name given by Lindley in 1826 to Ludisia, a genus of orchidaceous plants of the tribe Neottieæ, embracing only 4 known species, natives of China, Cochin-China, and the Malay peninsula. It is specially characterized by its free sepals and by the concave claw at the base of the labellum. One species, H. discolor, from southern China, is cultivated in gardens as a foliage-plant, the leaves being ample, and crimson underneath.

Hæmataria (hem-ạ-tā′ri-ạ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. αἷμα(τ-), blood, + -aria.] The so-called blood-animals; those intestinal animals which have blood and a cœloma, as an evolutionary series: contrasted with Anemaria. Haeckel.

hæmatinum (hē-mat′i-num), n. [L. (sc. vitrum, glass), neut. of hæmatinus, < Gr. αἱματίνος, of blood, bloody, < αἷμα(τ-), blood.] An ancient red glass used for mosaics, ornamental vases, etc., found in abundance in the ruins of Pompeii. It contains no tin and no coloring matter except cupric oxid.

Hæmatobranchia (hem″ạ-tō-brang′ki-ạ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. αἷμα(τ-), blood, + βράγχια, gills.] A subclass or grade of Arachnida, composed of three orders, Trilobita, Eurypterina, and Xiphosura, or trilobites, eurypterines, and king-crabs: same as Merostomata. E. R. Lankester, 1881.

hæmatobranchiate, a. See hematobranchiate.

Hæmatococcus (hem″ạ-tō-kok′us), n. [NL., < Gr. αἷμα(τ-), blood, + κόκκος, a berry.] A former genus of unicellular algæ, the species of which are now referred to Sphærella. They belong to the Volvocaceæ, which always have an actively motile vegetative condition.

Hæmatocrya (hem″ạ-tō-krī′ạ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. αἷμα(τ-), blood, + κρύος, cold.] Cold-blooded vertebrates collectively considered, as fish, amphibians, and reptiles; a binary subdivision of Vertebrata: opposed to Hæmatotherma. R. Owen.

hæmatocryal, a. See hematocryal.

hæmatologia (hem″ạ-tō-lō′ji-ạ), n. [NL.: see hematology.] Same as hematology.

Hæmatophilina (hem-ạ-tof-i-lī′nạ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. αἷμα(τ-), blood, + φίλος, loving.] A group of bats, consisting of the two genera Desmodus and Diphylla, which have a pair of enormous sharp-pointed upper incisors. In Desmodus the cardiac division of the stomach is enormously dilated, being longer than the whole body of the animal, lying coiled up in the abdomen, and serving as a reservoir for the fresh blood with which this veritable vampire gorges itself. The blood-sucking habit is more marked in these bats than in any other Chiroptera. See the generic words.

Hæmatopis (hē-mat′ō-pis), n. [NL., prob. for Hæmatopsis*, < Gr. αἷμα, blood, + ὄψις, appearance. Cf. Hæmopsis.] A genus of geometrid moths, founded by Hübner (1816), having slender palpi, plumose antennæ, the fore wings narrow and much pointed, and a deep ocherous color, with pink extradiscal spots. H. grataria is found from Maine to Texas, feeding in the larval state on plants of the genus Polygonum.

Hæmatopis grataria.
a, larva; b, pupa; c, eggs; d, imago. (All natural size.)

Hæmatopodidæ (hem″ạ-tō-pod′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hæmatopus (-pod-) + -idæ.] A family of wading birds related to the plovers; the oyster-catchers. They have three toes, and a bill of remarkable shape, somewhat like a woodpecker's. The bill is much longer than the head, contracted, compressed and beveled, and truncated at the end. There is but one genus, Hæmatopus. The family sometimes includes the turnstones (Strepsilas), when the oyster-catchers proper are termed Hæmatopodinæ. Also Hæmatopidæ.

Hæmatopodinæ (hem″ạ-tō-pō-dī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Hæmatopus (-pod-) + -inæ.] The oyster-catchers as a subfamily of Hæmatopodidæ or of Charadriidæ. Also called Hæmatopinæ.

Hæmatopus (hē-mat′ō-pus), n. [NL., < Gr. αἷμα(τ-), blood, + πούς = E. foot.] The typical genus of Hæmatopodidæ: so called from the red color of the legs. H. ostrilegus is the common oyster-catcher of Europe; H. palliatus is that of North America. There are others, some of which are partly white, like the two named, while the rest are of somber blackish or fuliginous hues all over, as H. ater. See oyster-catcher, and cut in next column.

hæmatorn (hem′ạ-tôrn), n. [< NL. Hæmatornis.] Blyth's name for a hawk of the genus Hæmatornis (Vigors), the bacha, Falco bacha.

Hæmatornis (hem-ạ-tôr′nis), n. [NL., < Gr. αἷμα(τ-), blood, + ὄρνις, a bird.] 1. A genus of birds of prey, containing such Indian hawks as the bacha and cheela. N. A. Vigors, Proc. Zoöl. Soc., 1831, p. 170.—2. A genus of turdoid passerine birds, the bulbuls: same as Pycnonotus. W. Swainson, 1831.

American Oyster-catcher (Hæmatopus palliatus).

Hæmatostaphis (hem-ạ-tos′tạ-fis), n. [NL. (Hooker, 1860), < Gr. αἷμα(τ-), blood, + σταφίς, a dried grape, a raisin.] The name given by Sir J. D. Hooker in 1860 to a monotypic genus of tropical African plants belonging to the family Anacardiaceæ, tribe Spondieæ, and characterized by the possession of 3 unequal imbricate petals and 6 stamens in the flower, an oblong drupe, and pinnate leaves. The species, H. Barteri, is a small tree with twisted branches and small white flowers in elongated axillary panicles. The fruit is red, edible, has an acid flavor, and is called blood-plum. The tree inhabits the banks of the Niger river.

Hæmatotherma (hem″ạ-tō-thėr′mạ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. αἷμα(τ-), blood, + θερμός, warm.] Warm-blooded animals, as mammals and birds, collectively considered: one of two divisions of Vertebrata: opposed to Hæmatocrya. R. Owen.

hæmatothermal, a. See hematothermal.

Hæmatoxylum (hem-ạ-tok′si-lum), n. [NL., < Gr. αἷμα(τ-), blood, + ξύλον, wood.] A genus of plants established by Linnæus in 1753, belonging to the large and widely distributed family Cæsalpiniaceæ, of which only one species, H. Campechianum, the logwood-tree, is known. It is a native of Central America and the West Indies, and furnishes logwood. Botanically the genus is characterized by its flattened lanceolate pod, splitting through the middle of each valve into two false valves. See cut at logwood, 1.

Hæmatozoa (hem″ạ-tō-zō′ạ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. αἷμα(τ-), blood, + ζῷον, an animal.] A general name of the minute Entozoa or internal parasites which are found in blood, as the Distoma hæmatobium or Bilharzia hæmobia, and the Hexathyridium venarum or Polystoma sanguicola. The term has no classificatory significance.

hæmatozoan, hæmatozoic. See hematozoan, hematozoic.

Hæmodipsa (hem-ō-dip′sạ), n. [NL., < Gr. αἷμα, blood, + δίψα, thirst.] A genus of land-leeches. H. ceylonica is an example. See land-leech.

Hæmodoraceæ (hem″ō-dō-rā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hæmodorum + -aceæ.] A family of monocotyledonous petaloid plants, established by Robert Brown in 1810, related to the Liliaceæ and Amaryllidaceæ. As now restricted it embraces 9 genera and 33 species, inhabiting Australia, South Africa, and America. Formerly many other genera were included in it which are now placed in related families. The name is derived from the red color yielded by the roots of some of the species.

Hæmodorum (hem-ō-dō′rum), n. [NL., < Gr. αἷμα, blood, + δῶρον, gift.] The typical genus of the plant family Hæmodoraceæ, founded by J. E. Smith in 1798, consisting of 17 species, all natives of Australia. They are erect glabrous herbs with equitant leaves, and cymes or heads of small flowers. The fibrous roots are often thickened into tubers. The inflorescence is always glabrous, the ovary nearly free, its cells containing two ovules, and the seeds are peltate.

hæmony (hem′ō-ni), n. [Used only in the passage cited, appar. in reference to Gr. αἱμόνιος, blood-red, < αἵμων, bloody, < αἷμα, blood; or to Gr. εἴμων for δαίμων, δαήμων, knowing, skilful (in allusion to its 'divine effect'). Coleridge fancies here a compound of Gr. αἷμα, blood, and οἶνος, wine; alluding to the blood of Jesus Christ.] A supposed miraculous plant, described in Milton's "Comus."

> A certain shepherd lad . . .
> Would . . . show me simples of a thousand names,
> Telling their strange and vigorous faculties.
> Amongst the rest a small unsightly root,
> But of divine effect, he cull'd me out:
> The leaf was darkish, and had prickles on it,
> But in another country, as he said,
> Bore a bright golden flower, but not in this soil;
> Unknown, and like esteem'd, and the dull swain
> Treads on it daily with his clouted shoon;
> And yet more med'cinal is it than that moly
> That Hermes once to wise Ulysses gave;
> He call'd it hæmony, and gave it me,
> And bade me keep it as of sovran use
> 'Gainst all enchantments, mildew blast, or damp,
> Or ghastly furies' apparition. Milton, Comus, l. 638.

["Prickles" is supposed to allude to Christ's crown of thorns, and "bright golden flower" to the fruits of salvation.]

Hæmopsis (hē-mop′sis), n. [NL., < Gr. αἷμα, blood, + ὄψις, appearance.] A genus of leeches, containing the horse-leech, H. sanguisorba.

hæmoptoë (hē-mop′tō-ē), n. [NL., an improp. formation: see hemoptysis.] Same as hemoptysis.

hæmorrhagia (hem-ō-rā′ji-ạ), n. [L.: see hemorrhage.] 1. In pathol., same as hemorrhage.—2. [cap.] [NL.] A genus of clear-winged moths, of the family Sesiidæ, containing such as the North American H. gracilis. Grote and Robinson, 1865. Now placed in Hemaris.

Hæmulon (hē-mū′lon), n. [NL., < Gr. αἷμα, blood, + οὖλον, in pl. οὖλα, the gums.] A genus of percoid fishes, the type of the family Hæmulonidæ, having the lips blood-red near the corners of the mouth, whence the name. The species are known as grunts, grunters, pig-fish, and redmouths. See cut under grunt.

Hæmulonidæ (hem-ū-lon′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hæmulon + -idæ.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, named from the genus Hæmulon. Numerous species are found in tropical and warm seas: those of Hæmulon are confined to the American waters, while Pomadasis has an extensive range. Also called Pristipomidæ.

Haeser's formula. Same as formula of Christison (which see, under formula).

haet, hait (hāt), n. [Also written hate, haid, a whit, a bit, used, as in the quotation, with qualifying deil, devil, as a vigorous negative.] The least thing; an iota; a whit. [Scotch.]

> They loiter, lounging, lank, an' lazy;
> Tho' deil haet ails them, yet uneasy.
> Burns, The Twa Dogs, l. 205.

haf[1]†. An obsolete preterit of heave. Chaucer.

haf[2], haff, n. See haaf.

haffet, haffit (haf′et, -it), n. [Sc., also half-fet, contr. of half-head*, ult. < AS. healf-heáfod, the fore part of the head, the sinciput. Cf. forehead (contr. pron. for′ed).] 1. The side of the head; in the plural, the temples.

> His bonnet rev'rently is laid aside,
> His lyart haffets wearing thin and bare.
> Burns, Cottar's Saturday Night.

2. Among workmen, the fixed part of a lid or cover, to which the movable part is hinged.

haffle (haf′l), v. i.; pret. and pp. haffled, ppr. haffling. [Perhaps of imitative origin. Cf. ha[1], v., haw[7], v., hesitate, and cf. faffle, maffle.] To waver or shuffle in speaking; prevaricate. [Prov. Eng.]

hafflin (haf′lin), n. and a. See halfling[1].

Hafiz (hä′fiz), n. [Pers. hāfiz, < Ar. hāfiz, hāfuz, a guard, one who keeps (in memory); applied technically to one who knows the whole Koran by heart, < Ar. hafaza, keep, retain, hafz, memory.] A title or appellative of a Mohammedan who knows the whole of the Koran by heart.

> The Dervish Falladeen, whose prefix of Hafiz means "one who has committed the Koran to memory."
> J. Grant.

haflin[1] (haf′lin), n. and a. See halfling[1].

haflin[2], haflins (haf′lin, -linz), adv. See halfling[2].

haft[1] (håft), n. [(1) < ME. haft, heft, < AS. hæft[1], a handle, = D. heft, hecht = MLG. hechte = OHG. hefti, MHG. hefte, G. heft, a handle, hilt, portion of a book, = Icel. hepti (for hefti), a handle, = Dan. hefte = Sw. häfte, handle, hilt, portion of a book. haft[1] (hâft), v. t. [= OS. heftjan, fetter, bind, = D. hechten, fasten, attach, = MLG. hechten, heften, attach, arrest, = OHG. heftan, MHG. G. heften, fasten, attach, = Icel. hepta, hefta, bind, fetter, refl. restrain oneself, forbear, = Dan. hefte, Sw. häfta, bind, stitch, arrest, = Goth. haftjan, fasten, attach, refl. cling, stick, force oneself in upon; from the noun.] 1. To set in a haft; furnish with a handle.

Tools and instruments consisted of polished flints of various shapes, and of teeth and bones of animals, hafted in different ways according to the uses for which they were intended. Westminster Rev., CXXVIII. 538.

2. To drive up to the haft or hilt, as a knife or dirk.

This mye blade in thye body should bee with speedines hafted. Stanihurst, Conceites, p. 143.

3. To fix or settle firmly; plant. [Scotch.]

I hae heard him say that the root of the matter was mair deeply hafted in that wild muirland parish than in the Canongate of Edinburgh.
Scott, Heart of Mid-Lothian, xxxix.

It shows how well hafted is the Royal Society's claim, that a president should acquire the notion that it is acknowledged and acted upon by the other Societies.
De Morgan, Budget of Paradoxes, p. 20.

haft[2] (hâft), n. [Prob. connected with haft[1], as a 'fixed' place of abode. Cf. haft[1], v., 3.] A place of abode: dwelling; lodging. [Scotch.]

"Her bairn," she said, "was her bairn, and she came to fetch her out of ill haft and waur guiding."
Scott, Heart of Mid-Lothian, xviii.

hafter[1] (hâf'tėr), n. [< haft[1], v., + -er[1].] In cutlery, a workman who forms and fixes the hafts or handles of knives.

hafter[2]† (hâf'tėr), n. [Appar. < haft*, v. (found elsewhere only in hafting), + -er.] A wrangler; a caviler; a debater. Hollyband, Diet., 1593. (Halliwell.) hafting†, n. [Verbal n. of haft* in hafter[2], q. v.] Wrangling; debate.

Whan was there more haftyng and craftyng to scrape money together? J. Udall, On Ephesians, Prol.

With these pernitious words iterated continually unto him, he grew enkindled, and (without any farther hafting or holding off) . . . delivered up all that was demaunded.
Holland, tr. of Ammianus, p. 275.

haft-pipe (hâft'pīp), n. A handle in which the tang of a small tool is temporarily fixed for convenience in grinding the tool.

The handle is called a haftpipe, and is commonly a short piece of hazel-rod.
O. Byrne, Artisan's Handbook, p. 425.

hag[1] (hag), n. [Early mod. E. also hagg; < ME. hagge, hegge, a shortened form (by dropping the supposed termination) of AS. hægtes, hægtis, also hægtesse (in early glosses spelled haehtis, haehtisse), pl. hægtesse, a witch, a fury (glossing L. furia, striga, Erinys, Pythonissa, Tisiphone, pl. hægtesse, glossing L. Furiæ, Eumenides, Parcæ), = MD. haghetisse, a witch (cf. MD. haeghdisse, heghdisse, D. haagdis, hagedis, a lizard, an accom. to the word for 'witch' of MD. eggedisse = AS. ăthexe, E. ask[2], asker[2], q. v.), = OHG. hagazussa, hagzissa, hagzus, also hāzissa, hāzus (glossing L. furia, striga, Eumenis, Erynis), MHG. hecse (also hacke), G. hexe (> D. heks = Dan. hex = Sw. hexa), a hag; a compound of uncertain formation.] 1†. A witch; a sorceress; an enchantress; very rarely, a male witch; wizard; magician.

But you [powerful herbs] can force the fiercest Animals, . . .
Yea, fairest Planets (if Antiquitie Haue not bely'd the Haggs of Thessalie).
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 3.

And that old hag [Silenus] that with a staff his staggering limbs doth stay. Golding, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., iv.

How now, you secret, black, and midnight hags?
Shak., Macbeth, iv. 1.

2. A repulsive, vicious, or malicious old woman.

No, you unnatural hags,
I will have such revenges on you both!
Shak., Lear, ii. 4.

The hag . . . scowled at the fair Jewess with the malignant envy [with] which old age and ugliness, when united with evil conditions, are apt to look upon youth and beauty. Scott, Ivanhoe, xxiv.

3. A cyclostomous or marsipobranchiate fish, Myxine glutinosa in Europe, Myxine limosa in America, of the family Myxinidæ and suborder Hyperotreta. See these technical words. The hag resembles an eel in some respects, is a foot or more long, has a cirrous sucking mouth, a strong palatal tooth, pouched gills, and is parasitic inside other fishes.

Hag, or Slime-eel (Myxine glutinosa).

4. A white mist; phosphoric light; an appearance of light or fire on horses' manes or men's hair. [Prov. Eng.]

Haggs, says Blount, are said to be made of Sweat, or some other Vapour issuing out of the Head; a not unusual Sight among us when we ride by Night in the Summer-time: They are extinguished like Flames by shaking the Horses' Manes. But I believe rather it is only a Vapour reflecting Light, but fat and sturdy, compacted about the Manes of Horses or Men's Hair.
Bourne's Pop. Antiq. (1777), p. 371, note.

hag[1]† (hag), v. t. [< hag[1], n.] To vex; harass; torment.

That makes them in the dark see visions,
And hag themselves with apparitions.
S. Butler, Hudibras.

[< Heb. haggadah, < higgīd, say, tell.] 1. A legend, anecdote, or saying in the Talmud illustrative of the law.—2. [cap.] A free exposition and illustration of the Hebrew Scriptures; one of the two classes of rabbinical Biblical interpretation forming the Midrash.

This Haggadah or Agadah varies considerably both in nature and form. In its nature it sometimes humours, at other times threatens; it alternately promises and admonishes, persuades and rebukes, encourages and deters. In the end it always consoles, and throughout it instructs and elevates. In form it is legendary, historical, exegetic, didactic, theosophic, epigrammatic; but throughout it is ethical. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 285.

Also written haggada, agada, agadah.

haggadic, hagadic (ha-gad'ik), a. [< haggadah, hagadah, + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the Haggadah; characterized by free interpretation and exposition: opposed to halachic, or legal. Also agadic.

Like the Jews, too, the Samaritans had a haggada; indeed, the Arabic books they still possess under the name of chronicles are almost entirely haggadic fable, with very little admixture of true tradition. Encyc. Brit., XXI. 245.

Several entire treatises of an Agadic nature.
Encyc. Brit., XVI. 286.

haggadical (ha-gad'i-kal), a. Same as haggadic.

Haiduk, Hayduk (hī'dūk), n. [Also Hayduck, Heyduc; = D. heiduk = G. heiduck = Dan. Sw. heiduk = F. heiduque, < Hung. hajduk, lit. drovers, pl. of hajdu, a drover.] 1. Formerly, one of a class of mercenary foot-soldiers in Hungary of Magyar stock, distinguished for their gallantry in the field. For their fidelity to the Protestant cause throughout the religious insurrectionary war they were rewarded by Prince Bocskai in 1605 with the privileges of nobility, and with a territorial possession called the Haiduk district, which was enlarged as Haiduk county in 1876. The Hungarian light infantry were called Haiduks in the eighteenth century, from a regiment constituted for a time by these people. Compare chasseur, 3.

2. [cap. or l. c.] In Hungary, Austria, Germany, etc., an attendant in a judicial court, or in a palace or mansion, when dressed in the Hungarian semi-military costume.

I was once one of the handsomest men in Europe, and would defy any heyduc of the court to measure a chest or a leg with me. Thackeray, Barry Lyndon, xi.

haie†, n. 1. A Middle English form of hay[2].—2. [OF., = E. hay[2].] In her., a bearing representing a weir or dam made of osier or the like, wattled on upright stakes, three or more stakes being visible. It is always in fesse.

haifer†, n. An obsolete form of heifer.

haihow†, n. A form of heighaw.

haik[1], v. and n. See hake[4].

haik[2] (hīk), n. [Repr. Ar. hayk, < ḥāk, weave.] A piece of stuff used as an outer garment by the peoples of the Levant, especially by the desert tribes of Arabs. Its most familiar form is an oblong piece of loosely woven woolen cloth, in stripes of two or three colors. Also spelled haick, hyke.

The haiks are often made of hand-woven wool, very thick and warm, others of silk, while the poorer classes wear a few yards of thin white cotton stuff.
Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 663.

★hail[1] (hāl), n. [< ME. hayle, hazel, < AS. hægel, hægl, hagol, hagal = D. hagel = LG. hagel = OHG. hagal, MHG. G. hagel = Icel. hagl = Sw. Dan. hagel, hail. Cf. Gr. κάχληξ, κόχλαξ, a pebble, gravel; cf. hailstone.] Pellets of ice falling in showers. These pellets, called hailstones, frequently consist of a kernel of hard snow in the center, surrounded by alternate concentric layers of ice and snow; in other cases they have a radial structure. They assume various shapes, most commonly spheroidal, but some are pyramidal, others flat, and others irregularly oval. In size they are usually from a tenth to a quarter of an inch in diameter, but masses measuring from 12 to 15 inches in circumference and weighing over half a pound are of occasional occurrence. The fall of hail occurs chiefly in spring and summer, and most commonly precedes or accompanies a thunder-storm. The time of its continuance is always short, generally only a few minutes. The length of time requisite for the accretion of the larger hailstones is now believed to be obtained by the continued retention and repeated elevation in the atmosphere of a pellet, initially small, which is several times carried through successive regions of rain and snow. In a ship's log-book, abbreviated h.

For thou mayst see a sunshine and a hail
In me at once. Shak., All's Well, V. iii.

Instead of strength of reason, he answers with a multitude of words, thinking . . . that he may use hail when he hath no thunder.
Bp. Wilkins, Discovery of New World, i. 9.

The island-valley of Avilion;
Where falls not hail, or rain, or any snow,
Nor ever wind blows loudly.
Tennyson, Morte d'Arthur.

The origin of hail is still obscure, but it is probably formed by an intensely cold current of air passing into a region of warm moist air, and reducing the temperature of the whole below the freezing-point.
Huxley, Physiography, p. 65.

In a hail-storm the ascending currents are so strong, and reach so high up into the upper strata of the atmosphere, that the rain-drops are carried up into the cold regions above, and into the central part within the isobaric and isothermic surface of the freezing-point, where they are frozen into hail. W. Ferrel, Treatise on the Winds.

hail[1] (hāl), v. [E. dial. also haggle (see haggle[2]); < ME. hailen, < AS. hagalian = D. hagelen = G. hageln = Icel. hagla, hegla = Sw. hagla = Dan. hagle, hail; from the noun.] I. intrans. To pour down hail.

I wept and I wayled,
The teares down hayled,
But nothing it auailed.
Skelton, Philip Sparow.

My people shall dwell in a peaceable habitation, . . . when it shall hail, coming down on the forest.
Isa. xxxii. 18, 19.

II. trans. To pour down or put forth like hail; emit in rapid succession.

For, ere Demetrius look'd on Hermia's eyne,
He hail'd down oaths, that he was only mine.
Shak., M. N. D., i. 1.

But Walter hail'd a score of names upon her.
Tennyson, Princess, Prol.

hail[2], a. See hale[2].

hail[3] (hāl), interj. [A particular use of hail[2], a., = hale[2], a., after Icel. heill in similar use, as Heill, Magnus! hail, Magnus! kom heill, welcome ('come hale')! far heill, farewell ('go hale')! sit heill ('sit hale')! etc.; so in AS., hāl beó thū, or hāl wes thū, hail! lit. 'be thou whole' (see wassail). The Icel. heill, E. hail[2], hale[2] = AS. hāl, E. whole. The interj. hail is thus an abbreviated sentence expressing a wish, 'be whole,' i. e., be in good health, and equiv. to L. salve, plural salvete, or ave, plural avete (see salve[4] and ave).] Be whole; be safe; be happy: a term of salutation now used without thought of its literal meaning, and merely as an exclamatory expression of well-wishing: used absolutely, or followed by a noun with to.

And they began to salute him, Haile Kynge of ye Jewes.
Bible of 1551, Mark xv. 18.

Hail to the Chief who in triumph advances!
Scott, L. of the L., ii. 19.

Hail to thee, blithe spirit. Shelley, To a Skylark.

[Used in the following passage as a quasi-noun:

The angel Hail
Bestow'd; the holy salutation used Long after to blest Mary, second Eve.
Milton, P. L., v. 385.]

All hail! a more emphatic form of hail[3].

Cæsar, all hail! Shak., J. C., ii. 2.

All hail the power of Jesus' name!
Let angels prostrate fall!
E. Perronet, Coronation Hymn.

★Hail Mary. See Ave Maria, under ave.

hail[3] (hāl), v. [< ME. hailen, heylen, heglen, salute, greet, < hail, heil, as a salutation: see hail[3], interj. Cf. equiv. hailse, halse[3].] I. trans. 1. To salute; welcome; address.

When we had hailed each other, and had spoken those common words that be customably spoke at the first meeting and acquaintance of strangers, we went thence to my house. Sir T. More, Utopia (tr. by Robinson), Prol., p. 30.

They hail'd him father to a line of kings.
Shak., Macbeth, iii. 1.

The man that hails you Tom or Jack.
Cowper, Friendship, l. 169.

Such hail the end of their existence as a port of refuge.
Lamb, New Year's Eve.

2. To call to, as a person, or, by metonymy, a place, house, ship, etc., at a distance; cry out to in order to attract attention.

Merham, intending to know what they were, hailed them. Capt. John Smith, True Travels, I. 52.

The market boat is on the stream,
And voices hail it from the brink.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, cxxi.

The huge Earl Doorm, . . . like one that hails a ship, Cried out with a big voice. Tennyson, Geraint.

Ere the anchor had come home, a shout
Rang from the strand, as though the ship were hailed.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, III. 6.

II. intrans. To offer or exchange greeting or tidings; report or declare one's self.

They [the ships] came all together, with friendly salutations and gratulations one to an other: which they terme by the name of Hayling: a ceremonie done solemnly, and in verie good order, with sound of Trumpets and noyse of cheereful voyces. Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 609.

To hail for a trip, to state the quantity of the catch during a fishing-voyage: as, to hail for a trip of 50,000 pounds of halibut. [Colloq.]—To hail from, to come or profess to come from: belong to, as one's birthplace or residence: used specifically and originally of a ship with reference to the port at which she is registered, or from which she sets out on a voyage.

My companion hails from Little Athens.
L. M. Alcott, Hospital Sketches, p. 16.

★hail[3] (hāl), n. [< hail[3], v.] A salutation; greeting; call; summons; challenge of attention.

His cheer sounded more like a view-hallo than a hail.
Scott, St. Ronan's Well, xxi.

To pass the hail, on a man-of-war, to call out the station, as the men on lookout at night are required to do every half-hour, when the bell is struck, in order that the officer of the watch may know that the lookouts are vigilant.—Within hail, within call; within reach of the sound of the voice.

hail-fellow (hāl'fel′ō), n. [A compound word taken from the obs. phrase hail, fellow! So the fuller expression, "hail, fellow! well met!" is sometimes used as a descriptive adjective, as, "He was hail-fellow-well-met with everybody."] An intimate companion; a pleasant or genial companion.

Where diddest thou learne that, . . . being suffered to be familiar, thou shouldest waxe haile fellowe?
Lyly, Euphues and his England, p. 371.

Now man, that erst haile-fellow was with beast,
Woxe on to weene himself a god at least.
Bp. Hall, Satires, iii. 1.

At hail-fellow†, very intimate; on familiar terms.

The master and servant are at hail-fellow.
J. Goodman, Winter Evening's Conferences.

hailse†, v. t. [< ME. hailsen, haylsen, < Icel. heilsa = Sw. helsa = Dan. hilse, greet (= AS. hālsian, ME. halsen, greet: see halse[3], of which hailse is thus a doublet), < Icel. heill, etc., = AS. hāl, whole, hale: see hail[2], hale[2], and cf. hail[3], v. Cf. hail[3], v. t., and halse[3].] To greet; salute.

And therewith I turned me to Raphaell, and when we had hailsed the one the other, etc.
Sir T. More, Utopia (tr. by Robinson), Prol.

He hailsed me with mikel pride.
Als Y yod on ay Mounday (Child's Ballads, I. 274).

hailshot† (hāl'shot), n. pl. Small shot which scatter like hailstones in firing; grape-shot.

For our admirall . . . had prouided all our muskets with haile-shot, which did so gaule both the Indians and the Portugals that they made them presently retreat.
Hakluyt's Voyages, III. 711.

You should, by the same rule, control his bullet, in a line, except it were hailshot, and spread.
B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, i. 4.

hailsome (hāl'sum), a. A dialectal (Scotch) variant of wholesome.

hailstone (hāl′stōn), n. [< ME. hailstone, haylestone, hawelston (AS. hægelstān*, not found) = D. hagelsteen = MHG. G. hagelstein = Icel. hagl-steinn = Sw. ODan. hagelsten (cf. G. Sw. Dan. hagelkorn); < hail[1] + stone.] A single pellet of hail. See hail[1].

When there fell any haile or raine . . . the haile-stones wee gathered vp. Hakluyt's Voyages, II. ii. 163.

I will rain upon him . . . great hailstones, fire, and brimstone. Ezek. xxxviii. 22.

hail-storm (hāl′stôrm), n. A storm of hail.

haily (hā′li), a. [< hail[1] + -y[1].] Consisting of hail; full of hail.

But with a thicker night black Auster shrouds
The heavens, and drives on heaps the rolling clouds,
From whose dark womb a rattling tempest pours,
Which the cold North congeals to haily showers.
Pope, tr. of Statius's Thebaid, i.

hain (hān), v. [Also written hane; < ME. haynen*, < Icel. hegna, hedge, fence, protect, keep, = Sw. hägna = Dan. hegne, fence, inclose, < Icel. hagi = Sw. hage = Dan. have = AS. haga = E. haw[1], a place hedged in: see haw[1], hay[2], hedge.] I. trans. 1†. To hedge or fence in; inclose; in particular, of grass, to inclose or preserve for mowing or pasture.

I have four-and-twenty milk-white cows,
All calved in a day;
You'll have them, and as much hained grass
As they all on can gae.
Earl Richard (Child's Ballads, III. 267).

2. To save; spare; refrain from using or spending. [Scotch.]

Auld Coila, now, may fidge fu' fain,
She's gotten poets o' her ain,
Chiels wha their chaunters winna hain.
Burns, To William Simpson.

II. intrans. To be thrifty and saving; be economical or parsimonious. [Scotch.]

hainch, v. t. A dialectal variant of haunch.

hainous†, a. An obsolete spelling of heinous.

hain't, haint. A contraction of have not or has not. See ha'n't.

hair[1] (hār), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also haire, hayre, heare, heere, here; < ME. here, heer, her, < AS. hǣr = OS. hār = OFries. her = D. haar = MLG. hār = OHG. MHG. hār, G. haar = Icel. hār = Sw. hår = Dan. haar, hair; not in Goth., where tagl (= E. tail[1]) and skuft mean 'hair.' Root unknown; not connected with L. cæsaries, a head of hair. Hair in defs. 5 and 6 was orig. a different form, derived from the preceding, namely, ME. haire, hayre, heyre, < AS. hǣre (= OHG. hāra, hārra (> F. haire) = Icel. hæra), f., haircloth, < hǣr, hair.] I. n. 1. One of the numerous fine filaments which more or less completely cover the skin of most mammals, and constitute the characteristic coat of this class of animals; any capillary outgrowth from the skin. Hairs are extravascular, non-nervous, epidermal, or exoskeletal structures belonging to the same category as nails, scales, feathers, and other horny or cuticular outgrowths, being chiefly distinguished by their simplicity, and their extreme slenderness in proportion to their length, which may reach several feet. A hair consists of an outer or cuticular layer of cells, extremely variable in the details of their arrangement, generally imbricated and with their free edges presenting away from the skin. These constitute the hair-cuticle or cortex, upon the nature of which largely depends the capability of being woven or felted of some kinds of hair, as wool. Inside the cuticle is a tubular shaft of longitudinal fibers, resulting from fibrillation of cells, which may contain a core of granular cells, the pith or medulla of the hair. Air finds its way into the interstices of the pith. Many hairs are quite cylindrical, or have but slightly reniform cross-section; such are apt to be long, slender, and straight, and possess the least felting properties, especially if their cuticular cells be also smooth. Curly, kinky, or woolly hairs, as of the negro's head or a man's beard, owe this character chiefly to the fact that they are flattened in different planes in successive parts of their length. Hairs of extreme length and fineness grow upon the head of women; others are of microscopic size, retaining, however, the same structural character. Hairs of great comparative thickness and stiffness are called bristles, as those on the back of swine, the whiskers of a cat, etc. When still stouter and sharp-pointed, bristles become spines, as of the hedgehog; one extremely short, broad, blunt, flattened spine becomes a scale, as on a pangolin; and a hair which tends to branch out in a certain manner becomes a feather. (See feather.) An ordinary hair is divided into the root, which is inserted into the skin; the stem or shaft; and the point, which is the part into which the pith does not extend. The root is planted in a little pit or follicle formed by an inversion of the skin, the hair-follicle; this follicle has a dermic and an epidermic layer, and some of the latter which adheres when a hair is plucked out by the root is called the root-sheath. The root is commonly enlarged or bulbous, constituting the hair-bulb. Associated with the hair-follicle may be one or more sebaceous glands whose secretion keeps the hair glossy, and tiny muscles (arrectores pili) are sometimes attached to the sheath of the root, whose action may cause the hair to bristle or "stand on end." (See horripilation.) Hair is sometimes colorless, but oftenest heavily pigmented, giving animals their natural colors, in which various shades of black, brown, and gray, with flaxen or yellow, are the commonest, the purer reds, blues, and greens being comparatively rare. In all species of mammals, including man, the hair attains a definite length on certain areas of the body; if cut off, it grows again. Most mammals have at least two sets of hairs: one comparatively long, stout, and straight, coming to the surface and overlying a finer, shorter, and more curly set, among the roots of which latter a still finer coating of hairs may be found. The aggregate of the hairs is the pelage, corresponding to the plumage of a bird; a copious pelage of fine hairs is a fur, as of the fur-seal, otter, beaver, etc.; the fur peculiar to animals of the sheep kind is called a fleece. In most animals the hairs have a definite period of growth, maturity, and decay, which results in the periodical shedding of the coat. Hair is a specially cuticular structure, and hence mostly confined to the exterior of the body; but since epidermis becomes insensibly modified into the epithelium of mucous membrane, so hairs may be found growing inside any of the natural openings of the body, as the ears, nostrils, mouth, and various cutaneous pouches of different animals. Like other horny structures, hairs are often a secondary sexual character, either appearing on certain parts of the body coincidently with the maturity of the sexual function (see puberty), or growing in a certain way in one sex and not in the other, as the human beard, the mane of the lion, etc. Though hairs are in themselves non-nervous, certain hairs on some animals constitute feelers or tactile organs of great delicacy; such are known as tactile hairs.

a, cuticle; b, deeper parts of skin; c, a hair; d, an arrector pili muscle; e, sebaceous glands.

Gray hairs are here and there upon him, yet he knoweth not. Hos. vii. 9.

From every haire of bold Robins head
The blood ran trickling down.
Robin Hood and the Stranger (Child's Ballads, V. 407).

He could distinguish and divide
A hair 'twixt south and south-west side.
S. Butler, Hudibras, I. i. 68.

2. The aggregate of the hairs which grow on any mammal; hairs collectively or in the mass; in the widest sense, a dermal coat or covering either of hair (specifically so called), wool, or fur; pelage; in common use, the natural capillary covering of a person's head: formerly sometimes in the plural.

Tho redde he me how Sampson loste his heres Slepynge, his lemman kitte it with hir scheres.
Chaucer, Prol. to Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 721.

His naturall haire, which was exceedingly thicke and curled, was so prettily elevated in height, that it served him always instead of a hat. Coryat, Crudities, I. 70.

In troth, thy hair is of an excellent colour since I saw it. O those bright tresses, like to threads of gold!
Dekker and Webster, Westward Ho, iii. 4.

3. On animals, with the exception of most mammals, a filament; any fine capillary or hair-like outgrowth from the body or any part of it, but especially its surface; one of the objects which compose the hairiness, pubescence, or pilosity of an animal, or such objects collectively: used in both the singular and the plural: as, the hair or hairs of a caterpillar, that which clothes or those which clothe a lobster's gills, etc. Most members of the animal kingdom have hair or hairs of some kind, resembling the peculiar covering of mammals more or less nearly in appearance or function, or both, and consequently taking the same name, though the structural character of these appendages may be entirely different.

4. In bot., an expansion of the epidermis, consisting of a single cell or of a row or number of cells. Hairs assume a variety of forms, even the simple or unicellular ones being often branched, variously curved, or stellate. Cotton-fibers are hairs consisting of elongated single cells. Compound hairs may start from a single cell or a group of cells, and may have their derivative cells arranged in many ways. According to form, hairs may be called capitate, clavate, uncinate, barbed, peltate, etc. They are often glandular and viscid at the extremity. Most hairs or branches of hairs in plants are more or less conical.

Vegetable Hairs.

1, stellate hair of Draba alpina; 2, pluricellular hair of Erithrichium villosum; 3, simple (unicellular) hair of Valeriana capitata. (All highly magnified.)

5†. Haircloth; a garment of haircloth, especially a hair shirt used for penance.

She . . . under hir robe of gold, that sat ful fayre, Hadde next her flesshe yclad hir in an heyre.
Chaucer, Second Nun's Tale, l. 133.

6. A cloth, mat, or other fabric of hair used for various purposes in the trades, as in the extraction of oils, manufacture of soap from cocoanut-oil, etc.

Each bag [woolen bags containing oil-seed meal] is further placed within hairs, thick mats of horse-hair bound with leather. Encyc. Brit., XVII. 742.

7†. Particular natural set or direction; course; order; drift; grain; character; quality.

The quality and hair of our attempt Brooks no division. Shak., 1 Hen. IV., iv. 1.

A lady of my hair cannot want pitying.
Fletcher (and another?), Nice Valour, i. 1.

8. In mech., a locking spring or other safety contrivance in the lock of a rifle or pistol, which may be released by a very slight pressure on a hair-trigger.—9. One of the polyps, as sertularians and others, which grow on oyster-shells. See graybeard, 3, and redbeard.—African hair, the fiber of the leaves of the small palm of southern Europe and northern Africa, Chamærops humilis.—Against the hair†, contrary to the natural set of a thing; against the grain.

Notwithstanding, I will go against the haire in all things, so I may please thee in anie thing.
Lyly, Euphues and his England, sig. Aa I.

He is melancholy without cause, and merry against the hair! Shak., T. and C., i. 2.

A hair of the dog that bit one, the same thing that caused the malady or trouble used as a remedy or means of relief; specifically, spirits drunk in the morning after a debauch, for the purpose of steadying the nerves: in allusion to the popular superstition that a hair of the dog that has bitten one will cure the bite.

Such heartsick woe,
By an immoderate drunkennesse procurde,
Must by a haire of the same dog be curde.
Time's Whistle (E. E. T. S.), l. 1860.

Elsley need not be blamed for pitying her [Italy]; only for holding with most of our poets a vague notion that her woes were to be cured by a hair of the dog who bit her.
Kingsley, Two Years Ago, x.

Auditory hairs. See auditory.—Berenice's hair. See Coma Berenices, under coma[2].—Bulb of a hair. See bulb.—Buttoned hairs, in entom., long stout hairs or setæ with a knob or button at one end. Also called knobbed hairs.—Camel's hair. See camel.—Glandular hairs. See glandular.—Gray hairs, figuratively, old age: as, to respect one's gray hairs.—Knobbed hairs. Same as buttoned hairs.—Not to turn a hair, not to show any sign of being ruffled, disordered, or discomposed.

A pint of port? Man alive! we can take two bottles, and never turn a hair. W. Besant, Fifty Years Ago, p. 66.

Not worth a hair, of no value; contemptible.—Of a hair†, exactly alike.

For the pedlar and the tinker, they are two notable knaves, both of a haire.
Greene, Quip for an Upstart Courtier (Harl. Misc., V. 417). (Davies.)

Stinging hair, one of the coiled filaments which spring out of the cnidæ or nematocysts of jellyfish and other cœlenterates; a cnidocil; the urticating filament or nettling thread of a thread-cell. See cut under cnida.—Tactile hair, a hair which subserves any special sense of touch, as those of the whiskers of a cat. Such hairs are technically called pili tactiles. See vibrissa.—The turn of a hair, a close chance; a narrow escape.

Colonel Capadose said that it was the turn of a hair that they had n't buried him alive. The Century, XXXVI. 127.

To a hair, to a nicety; with the utmost exactness or precision.

I know my advocate to a hair, and what Will fetch him from his prayers, if he use any.
Fletcher, Spanish Curate, iv. 2.

To comb one's hair the wrong way, to vex or anger one, especially by speech; address one irritatingly. [Colloq.]—To split hairs, to be unduly nice in making distinctions. Compare hair-splitter, hair-splitting.

II. a. Made of or stuffed with hair: as, hair jewelry; a hair mattress. [The earlier adjective, hairen, is now obsolete.]—Hair broom, a broom made of bristles technically called hair.—Hair glove, a glove made of rough haircloth for rubbing the skin while bathing.—Hair line, a line made of hair; now, specifically, a fishing-line of horsehair. Lines made of hair, especially clothes-lines, were common in the middle ages and down to the seventeenth century.—Hair pencil, a fine brush or pencil made of hair, used in painting, etc. Hair pencils are made of very fine hair, as of the camel, squirrel, marten, badger, polecat, etc., mounted in a quill when of small size.—Hair shirt, a shirt made of haircloth, used especially for penance. See haircloth.

When no prelate's lawn with hair-shirt lined
Is half so incoherent as my mind.
Pope, Imit. of Horace, I. i. 165.

★hair[1] (hãr), v. i. [< hair[1], n.] To produce or grow hair. [Colloq.]—To hair up, to support a growth of polyps, algals, etc., as oysters.

hair[2]†, v. t. Another spelling of hare[2].

hairbell (hãr′bel), n. An erroneous spelling of harebell. [This spelling, taken as hair[1] + bell[1], has been preferred by Lindley, Prior, and others, as being descriptive of the filiform stalk and bell-shaped flowers of the plant.]

hair-bird (hãr′bėrd), n. Same as chip-bird. [U. S.]

hair-bracket (hãr′brak″et), n. In ship-building, a molding which in many vessels comes in at the back of the figurehead or runs aft from it.

The middle and small rails had their lower ends forward resting on the hair bracket (or continuation of the curve of the cheek), and their after ends simply butted against the side. Thearle, Naval Arch., § 232.

hairbrained (hãr′brānd), a. An erroneous spelling of harebrained.

hairbranch-tree (hãr′brânch-trē), n. A South African shrub, Trichocladus crinitus, of the family Hamamelidaceæ. The staminate flowers have long, linear-spatulate petals with revolute margins, whence perhaps the name. See Trichocladus.

hairbreadth (hãr′bredth), n. and a. I. n. The diameter or breadth of a hair; an infinitesimal space or distance. Among the Jews a hairbreadth was reckoned the 48th part of an inch; in Burma it is $\frac{1}{360}$ of an inch. Now generally written hair's-breadth.

You jest; but proud Cynisca makes me sad;
Nay; I'm within a hair-breadth raving mad.
Fawkes, tr. of Idylls of Theocritus, xiv.

He answered his description to a hair-breadth in everything. Sterne, Tristram Shandy, i. 10.

II. a. Of the breadth of a hair; extremely narrow.

Of hair-breadth 'scapes i' the imminent deadly breach;
Of being taken by the insolent foe
And sold to slavery. Shak., Othello, i. 3.

A love story, filled as usual with hair-breadth escapes, jealous quarrels, and questions of honor, runs through nearly every one of these dramas.
Ticknor, Span. Lit., II. 232.

hair-brush (hãr′brush), n. A brush for dressing and smoothing the hair.

hair-bulb (hãr′bulb), n. The root of a hair when bulbous, as it usually is.

haircap-moss (hãr′kap-môs), n. Moss of the genus Polytrichum, especially P. juniperinum, having the calyptra covered with fine hairs. It is said to have diuretic properties.

hair-cell (hãr′sel), n. 1. See cell.—2. The trichocyst of an infusorian, corresponding to the thread-cell or nematocyst of a cœlenterate.

hair-clam (hãr′klam), n. An ark-shell; one of the various species of Arcidæ. Also called hair-quag and blood-quag.

haircloth (hãr′klôth), n. Stuff or cloth made wholly or partly of hair, especially of the hair of the horse or of the camel. The smooth glossy haircloth formerly much used for covering chairs, sofas, etc., has the weft of the long hairs of horses' tails and the warp usually of linen yarn. Coarser haircloth is made for various purposes (in some countries for garments) of the shorter hairs of the horse and of various other animals, ★twisted together and used for both warp and weft. The sackcloth of the Bible was of this character. Shirts of such haircloth, rough and prickly, were formerly often worn next the skin by ascetics and penitents. See hair[1], n., 5, 6.

hair-compasses (hãr′kum″pas-ez), n. pl. See compass.

haircup-flower (hãr′kup-flou″ėr), n. In Australia, a myrtaceous plant, Calytrix tetragona, the calyx of which is provided with 10 awl-shaped, elongated bristles.

hair-dividers (hãr′di-vī″dėrz), n. pl. Hair-compasses. See compass.

hair-dress (hãr′dres), n. A head-dress; the manner of arranging the hair. [Rare.]

The Angakut of Cumberland Sound wear at certain parts the hairdress used by southern tribes.
Amer. Antiquarian, X. 41.

hair-dye (hãr′dī), n. A preparation for altering the color of the hair.

haired (hãrd), p. a. [< ME. hered; < hair[1] + -ed[2].] Having hair: commonly used in composition: as, long-haired, yellow-haired, dark-haired, etc.

He was . . . couert as a capull; all the corse ouer, ffro the hed to the hele, herit full thicke.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 5531.

hair-eel (hãr′ēl), n. Same as hairworm.

hairen† (hãr′en), a. [< ME. heeren, < AS. hǣren (= MHG. hāren, G. hären), of hair, < hǣr, hair, + -en[2].] Hairy; made of hair.

It must needs be to his sublimed and clarified spirit more punitive and afflictive than his hairen shirt and his ascetic diet was to his body.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1825), I. 84.

haireve, n. See hairif.

hair-feather (hãr′feᴛʜ″ėr), n. See feather.

hair-follicle (hãr′fol″i-kl), n. A tubular depression of the skin from the bottom of which a hair grows. It consists of a dermic and an epidermic coat. The latter is next to the root of the hair, to which it commonly adheres when the hair is plucked, and may easily be seen with the naked eye. It is directly continuous both with the cuticular surface of the skin and with the root of the hair itself. The dermic coat is similarly continuous with the corium or true skin, but distinct from the hair, and may often be separated into three recognizable layers: a basement membrane next to the cuticular layer of the follicle, a middle muscular or at least contractile layer, and a third layer of connective tissue. Associated with the follicles are the nutrient blood-vessels, nerves, sebaceous glands, and special muscles. A hair-follicle is also called a root-sheath, a name sometimes restricted to its epidermic layer. See cut under hair[1].

hair-gland (hãr′gland), n. 1. One of the minute sebaceous glands of the root of a hair, whose secretion serves to keep it glossy. See cut under hair.—2. In bot., a viscid, secreting, or odoriferous gland at the tip of a hair. In Droseraceæ, for example, the hair-glands are viscid or watery, whence the name sun-dew, ★from their resemblance to drops of dew.

hair-grass (hãr′gras), n. One of several species of grass bearing small flowers on slender, hair-like branches, especially Deschampsia cæspitosa, D. flexuosa, and Agrostis hyemalis.

hairif (hãr′if), n. [Also written harif, hariff, heiriff, haireve, and haritch, and variously accom. hairup, hairough, etc., prop. huyrif, < ME. hayryf, harife, hariffe, etc., < AS. hegerife, appar. < hege, a hedge (E. hay[2], q. v.), + rif* (Ettmüller—not verified) = Icel. rifr, abundant, rife: see rife.] The common goose-grass or bedstraw, Galium Aparine, a plant belonging to the family Rubiaceæ, and closely related to the madder. See Galium, 2, and goose-grass, 1.

hairiff, n. See hairif.

hairiness (hãr′i-nes), n. The state of being hairy; the state of abounding in hair or being covered with it.

A character which, like hairiness, exists throughout the whole of the mammalia.
A. R. Wallace, Nat. Select., p. 348.

hair-knob (hãr′nob), n. The bulbous lower end of the root of a hair.

hair-lace (hãr′lās), n. [Early mod. E. also herelace.] A fillet for tying up the hair of the head.

Let me be whipt to death with ladies' hair-laces.
Middleton, Family of Love, i. 2.

A woman's hair-lace or fillet. Harvey.

hairless (hãr′les), a. [< hair[1] + -less.] Destitute of hair; bald: as, hairless scalps.

hair-lichen (hãr′lī″ken), n. In med., lichen pilaris, a variety of lichenous rash, in which the small tubercles are limited to the roots of the ★hairs of the skin, and scale off after ten days.

hair-line (hãr′līn), n. 1. A very slender line made in writing or drawing; a hair-stroke.—2. In printing, a very thin line on a type; also, a style of type consisting entirely of thin lines.

hairlip (hãr′lip), n. An erroneous spelling of harelip.

hair-meal†, n. [ME. hermele; < hair[1] + meal[2], a portion.] The thickness of a hair; a hair's-breadth.

Whan the shadwe of the pyn entreth anything within the cercle of thi plate an her mele.
Chaucer, Astrolabe, ii. § 38.

hair-needle† (hãr′nē″dl), n. [ME. not found; AS. hǣrnǣdl*, "calamistrum" (Lye), < hǣr, hair, + nǣdl, needle.] A hair-pin.

hair-net (hãr′net), n. A net worn by women to confine the hair. Compare caul[1], 1 (a), crespine.

hair-oil (hãr′oil), n. Oil for dressing the hair, generally perfumed.

hair-picker (hãr′pik″ėr), n. A machine for cleaning hair and preparing it for use, as in upholstery.

hair-pin (hãr′pin), n. A pin used to support braids or plaits of hair, or to maintain the headdress, of whatever description, in its proper place. The simplest kind is made of wire bent in the form of the letter U, but hair-pins are made also of ivory, bone, tortoise-shell, wood, and metal, and in various shapes, often with ornamental heads or tops.

hair-powder (hãr′pou″dėr), n. A scented white powder used to sprinkle upon the hair of the head, in very general use in hair-dressing in the eighteenth century. An English law required it to be made exclusively of starch, but flour was sometimes used.

hair-pyrites (hãr′pi-rī″tēz), n. Native sulphid of nickel occurring in capillary filaments, of a yellow-gray color. Also called haarkies and millerite.

hair-quag (hãr′kwog), n. Same as hair-clam. [Rhode Island, U. S.]

hair-sac (hãr′sak), n. Same as hair-sheath.

hair-salt (hãr′sâlt), n. [= G. haar-salz; so called by Werner.] Same as epsomite and alunogen.

hair's-breadth (hãrz′bredth), n. The breadth of a hair, taken as the type of an indefinitely minute space or line, literal or figurative. See hairbreadth.

The people has a right to be governed not only well, but as well as possible, and owes no thanks to its servants the governors for stopping a hair's-breadth short of this point.
Brougham.

It is precisely this audacity of self-reliance, I suspect, which goes far toward making the sublime, and which, falling by a hair's-breadth short thereof, makes the ridiculous. Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 301.

hair-seal (hãr′sēl), n. A general name for any earless seal: used in distinction from fur-seal.

hair-shaped (hãr′shāpt), a. In bot., finely filiform or hair-like: often applied to the fine ramifications of the inflorescence of grasses.

hair-sheath (hãr′shēth), n. The follicle in which the root of a hair grows and is sheathed; a hair-follicle or root-sheath. Also called hair-sac. See cut under hair.

The softening or destruction of the hair-sheaths, either by lime or by putrefaction.
Workshop Receipts, 2d ser., p. 369.

hair-space (hãr′spās), n. The thinnest space used by printers.

hair-splitter (hãr′split″ėr), n. One given to hair-splitting or making sophistical distinctions in reasoning.

It is not the cavilling hair-splitter, but, on the contrary, the single-eyed servant of truth, that is most likely to insist upon the limitation of expressions too wide or too vague. De Quincey, Autobiog. Sketches, p. 61.

hair-splitting (hãr′split″ing), n. and a. I. n. The act or practice of making sophistical or over-nice distinctions in reasoning. Medieval writers were especially given to this method of escaping inconvenient consequences of their principles. The word is not properly applicable to the drawing of sound distinctions, however minute or difficult of apprehension they may be.

Hair-splitting is a consecrated term to decry what might with more justice be termed "a tendency towards mathematical exactitude in reasoning." Mind, XIII. 390.

II. a. Making sophistical or over-nice distinctions in reasoning; also, made by such reasoning.

In the eulogy on Story he [Charles Sumner] speaks of . . . the ancient hair-splitting technicalities of special pleading. N. A. Rev., CXXVI. 5.

hair-spring (hãr′spring), n. In watch-making, the fine hair-like spring coiled up within the balance-wheel and imparting motion to it.

hairst (hãrst), n. A dialectal (Scotch) form of harvest.

Ae hairst afore the Shirra-muir. Burns, Halloween.

hair-star (hãr′stär), n. A feather-star; a living crinoid of the family Comatulidæ.

hairster† (hãr′stėr), n. [ME. hayrester; < hair[1] + -ster.] A maker of hair garments; a worker ★in hair. York Plays, Int., p. xxv.

hairstreak (hãr′strēk), n. One of the small dark butterflies of the genus Thecla; a theclan: so called from the minute hair-like appendages of the hind wings. The green hairstreak is T. rubi; the black, T. pruni; there are many others.

hair-stroke (hãr′strōk), n. 1. A fine up-stroke in penmanship.—2. In printing, the fine line at the top or bottom of a letter; a serif; a hair-line.

hairtail (hãr′tāl), n. Any fish of the family Trichiuridæ, as Trichiurus lepturus, remarkable for the attenuation of its tail as well as for its silvery body, whence it is also called silvery hairtail. The species inhabit tropical and subtropical seas; that above named is most common in the Atlantic.

hair-trigger (hãr'trig″ėr), n. In a firearm, a secondary trigger controlling a safety locking device which secures the chief trigger, by which the piece is fired. The hair-trigger is so adjusted as to be actuated by a very light pressure, and sets free a spring mechanism called the hair, which strikes the tumbler-catch and throws the sear out of a notch in the tumbler.

Hair-triggers are now but very seldom made, and are considered very old-fashioned.
W. W. Greener, The Gun, p. 244.

hairtrigger-flower (hãr'trig-ėr-flou″ėr), n. An Australian plant of the genus Candollea, especially C. graminifolia, in which the column of stamens possesses a singular kind of irritability, causing it when touched to spring instantly from one side to the other of the corolla-tube.

hair-work (hãr'wėrk), n. Work done or something made with hair, specifically human hair. This material is or has been used for many kinds of work, generally intended for ornament, as fine netting (compare point-tresse), brooches, necklaces, watch-guards, purses, flowers, etc.; and it has also been worked into the form of pictures, usually small.

hair-worker (hãr'wėr″kėr), n. One who makes hair-work.

hairworm (hãr'wėrm), n. A nematoid thread-worm of the genus Gordius or family Gordiidæ in a broad sense: so called from its fineness. Also called hair-eel. See cut under Gordius.

There were hair-worms fabled to spring from horse-hair, in black lines writhing on the surface.
S. Judd, Margaret, i. 4.

hairy (hãr'i), a. [< hair[1] + -y[1].] 1. Overgrown with hair; covered or abounding with hair. In botany a plant is said to be hairy when the hairs are simple (not branched), and separately distinguishable. (See hair[1], 4.) Specifically used in entomology to describe a surface densely covered with short and rather stiff hairs: distinguished from pilose, villose, pubescent, etc.

Esau my brother is a hairy man. Gen. xxvii. 11.

2. Consisting of hair or of something like hair; having the character or appearance of hair: as, the hairy covering of an animal; the hairy filaments of a plant.

Storms have shed
From vines the hairy honours of their head.
Dryden.

3. Having or characterized by something resembling hair.

When my sword,
Advanced thus, to my enemies appear'd
A hairy comet, threatening death and ruin
To such as durst behold it!
Massinger, Unnatural Combat, i. 1.

Hairy oubit. See oubit.

hairybait (hãr'i-bāt), n. The lurg-worm or white-rag worm, Nephthys cæca.

hairycrown (hãr'i-kroun), n. The red-breasted merganser, Mergus serrator. J. T. Sharpless, 1833. [Chesapeake Bay, U. S.]

hairyhead (hãr'i-hed), n. The hooded merganser, Lophodytes cucullatus. G. Trumbull, 1888. [Southern U. S.]

haitt, haytt, interj. [ME., < OF. hait, hayt, heit, etc., pleasure, joy, eagerness, ardor, as used in the phrase de hait, a hait, a grant hait, with eagerness or ardor, quickly.] A word of encouragement or command to a draft-animal to urge him forward.

Hait Brok, hayt Scot; what spare ye for the stones?
Chaucer, Friar's Tale, l. 245.

With a hait, with a ree, with a wo, with a gee!
Old harvest song.

haith (hāth), interj. Faith! by my faith! See faith, interj. [Scotch.]

Haith, lad, ye little ken about it. Burns, The Twa Dogs.

haiver, v. i. See haver[3].

haivers, n. pl. See havers[2].

hajilij (haj'i-lij), n. [African.] The bito-tree, Agialid Ægyptiacum, referred by recent authors to the family Zygophyllaceæ: it inhabits northern Africa and southern and western Asia. The fruit is a fleshy edible drupe with a pentagonal stone that yields a valuable oil called zachun. In Africa there is a proverb that a bito-tree has the same value as a milch-cow. It is a thorny shrub or small tree of forbidding aspect, and inhabits dry barren places.

hajj, hajji. See hadj, hadji.

hake[1] (hāk), n. [< ME. hake* (not found), < AS. haca, also hæca, lit. a hook, but found only in the sense of 'bolt' or 'bar' (in glosses), = D. haak, a hook, = OHG. hāko (for hache*?), MHG. hāke, hāken, G. hake, haken, a hook, = Icel. haki = Sw. Norw. hake = Dan. hage, a hook (cf. deriv. Icel. haka = Sw. haka = Dan. hage, the chin); connected with AS. hōc, E. hook, and the ult. source of hake[2], hake[3], hatch[1], etc.: see hook, hake[2], etc.] 1. A hook; specifically, a pot-hook.

On went the boilers, till the hake
Had much ado to bear 'em.
Bloomfield, The Horkey.

2. A kind of weapon; a pike.

Fall to aray, pike and halfe hake,
Play now the men, the time has come.
T. E. (1555), quoted in Maitland's Reformation, p. 159.

3. pl. The draft-irons of a plow. Grose.

★ [Prov. Eng. in all uses.]

hake[2] (hāk), n. [Also haak; < ME. hake ("fysche, squilla," Prompt. Parv.), a short form (perhaps due to Scand. influence; cf. Norw. hake-fisk, a fish with a hooked under jaw, esp. of salmon and trout, lit. 'hook-fish'; Norw. hake, hook) of E. dial. haked: see haked.] 1. A gadoid fish of the family Merluciidæ, Merlucius smiridus or vulgaris, related to and resembling a cod, found on the Atlantic coasts of Europe. It has a short triangular first dorsal fin, elongated sinuated second dorsal and anal fins, and complete ventrals. It is voracious in habits and little esteemed for the table. The name is extended to other species of the genus, as M. bilinearis, the silver hake of New England, and M. productus, the merluccio of California. See Merlucius.

2. A gadoid fish of the genus Urophycis, found along the Atlantic coast of North America, as U. chuss, U. tenuis, and U. regius, recognized by the reduction of the ventral fins to two or three filamentous rays. These correspond to the English U. blennioides, the hake's-dame or forkbeard. They are all known as codlings, and some are called squirrel-hakes.

They are generally known as hakes, the true hake (Merlucius) being called silver-hake or whiting.
Stand. Nat. Hist., III. 273.

3. A gadoid fish of New Zealand, Lotella rhacinus, which has flattened ventrals of 6 rays, and a short anterior and long graduated second dorsal and anal fins.—Hake's-dame, the forkbeard. See def. 2, above. [Local, Eng. (Cornish).]—Silver hake, the American hake, Merlucius bilinearis, corresponding to Silver Hake, or New England Whiting (Merlucius bilinearis).

(From Report of U. S. Fish Commission, 1884.)

the European M. merlucius. Also called whiting, New England whiting, and Old England hake.—Sow or sow-belly hake, an old female hake.—Squirrel-hake, one of two fishes of the genus Urophycis, U. chuss and U. tenuis, found on the North Atlantic coast of North America.

hake[2] (hāk), v. i.; pret. and pp. haked, ppr. haking. [< hake[2], n.] To fish for hake; engage in the hake-fishery: as, a haking vessel, voyage, or crew.

hake[3] (hāk), n. [Also heck, hack, unassibilated (Scand.) forms of hatch[1], q. v.] 1. A frame for holding cheeses. [Scotch.]—2. A rack for horses or cattle to feed at. [Scotch.]—3. A drying-shed in a tile-making establishment.

hake[4], haik[1] (hāk), v.; pret. and pp. haked, haiked, ppr. haking, haiking. [Origin uncertain; cf. D. haken, long, hanker.] I. intrans. To go about idly or draggingly; loiter about. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

II.† trans. 1. To drag along idly.—2. To carry off by force; kidnap.

They'll haik ye up, and settle ye bye,
Till on your wedding day.
Katharine Janfarie (Child's Ballads, IV. 33).

hake[4], haik[1] (hāk), n. [< hake[4], haik[1], v.] 1. A lazy person who strolls about in search of what he can pick up, instead of working. [Obsolete or Scotch.]

Howe some synge Lætabundus
At euery ale stake
With, welcome hake and make!
Skelton, Colyn Cloute, l. 252.

2. A forward, tattling woman. [Scotch.]

Hakea (hā'kē-ä), n. [NL. (Schrader), named after Baron Hake, a German patron of science.] A large Australian genus of plants, belonging to the follicular section of the Proteaceæ, tribe Grevillieæ, and distinguished from Grevillia by its axillary inflorescence and samaroid seeds. The species, nearly 100 in number, are all evergreen shrubs or small trees with alternate, coriaceous, variously lobed, often spiny leaves. They are ornamental in cultivation, and several have acquired special names: for example, H. ulicina is called native furze; H. laurina, cushion-flower; H. acicularis lissosperma, native pear; and H. flexilis, twine-bush. The genus is found in the fossil state in a number of Tertiary beds in Europe.

Hakeeæ (hā-kē-ē'ē), n. pl. [NL., erroneously for Hakeëæ*, < Hakea + -eæ.] A subtribe of plants established by Endlicher in 1836, belonging to the family Proteaceæ, tribe Grevillieæ, and characterized by a 1- to 4-ovuled ovary and a 1- to 4-seeded fruit. It embraces the important genera Grevillia, Hakea, Roupala, and several others. No longer used.

haked (hā'ked), n. [Also hakot, etc.; < ME. haked* (> ML. hakedus), < AS hacod, hæced, hæcid (glossing L. lucius, also mugil), a pike, = OS. hacud = MD. heket = OHG. hachit, hechit, MHG. hechet, hecht, G. hecht, a pike; so named in allusion to the hooked under jaw, < AS. haca (orig. 'a hook,' but not found in this sense), a bolt or bar: see hake[1].] The pike, a fish. See hake[2]. [Prov. Eng.]

hakeney†, n. An obsolete form of hackney. Chaucer.

hakernt, n. An obsolete variant of acorn.

hakesdame (hāks'dām), n. Same as hake's-dame (which see, under hake[2]).

hake's-tooth (hāks'tōth), n. A tooth-shell of the family Dentaliidæ. [Local, Eng.]

haketon†, n. A Middle English form of acton.

And next his sherte an haketoun,
And over that an habergeon
For percinge of his herte.
Chaucer, Sir Thopas, l. 149.

hakim (ha-kēm'), n. [In def. 1, Ar. (and Pers.) ḥakim, a sage, wise man, doctor, particularly a physician; in def. 2, Ar. ḥākim, a governor; cf. ḥukm, authority, ḥukūmat, government; all < Ar. ḥakama, judge, govern.] 1. A wise or learned man; specifically, a physician.

From Barbary to Hindostan—from the setting to the rising sun—it is notorious that no travelling character is so certainly a safe one as that of hakim or physician.
De Quincey, Essenes, iii.

2. In Mohammedan countries, a governor, as of a province.

hakka (hak'ä), n. [Chinese (in Cantonese pronunciation), < keh, stranger, + kia, family.] Literally, an immigrant; one of a hardy class of Chinese dwelling in several localities in southern China, notably in the province of Kwang-tung (Canton), the descendants of immigrants from the northern parts of the country in the middle ages, and the object of much hostility on the part of the native or punti part of the population.

hakot, n. A dialectal form of haked. Skinner, 1671; Ainsworth.

halachah, halakah (ha-lak'ä), n.; pl. halachoth, halakoth (-ōth). [Heb. halakhah, 'the rule by which to go,' < halakh, go.] A traditional law deduced from the Bible; a law or rule regarding a matter or case on which there is no direct enactment in the Mosaic law, derived by analogy from this law, and included in the Mishna as a binding precept.

halachic, halakic (ha-lak'ik), a. [< halachah, halakah, + -ic.] Of, pertaining to, or of the nature of halachoth; based on a study of the law of Moses; legal, as opposed to homiletic: as, halachic exegesis. See haggadic.

halachoth, halakoth, n. Plural of halachah, halakah.

Haladroma (ha-lad'rō-mä), n. Same as Halodroma.

haladrome (hal'a-drōm), n. Same as halodrome.

halakah, halakic. See halachah, halachic.

halation (hā-lā'shon), n. [Irreg. < halo + -ation.] In photog., the effect of excess of light, or of adventitious reflected light, on some part of a negative, as when an interior view includes a window the light-rays from which produce a fog which spreads over the neighboring parts of the picture, or when light is reflected from the back of the plate.

Halation, or reflection from the back of the plate, was first disposed of by covering it with asphaltum.
The American, IX. 199.

halberd (hal'bėrd), n. [Also halbard, halbert, holbard; < OF. halebarde, F. hallebarde = Pr. Sp. Pg. alabarda = It. alabarda, labarda (cf. Halesia (hā-lē'si-ä), n. [Named after Stephen Hales (1677–1761), a distinguished botanist.] An untenable name for Mohrodendron, the snowdrop- or silverbell-tree of the United States, belonging to the family Styracaceæ, distinguished from Styrax chiefly by its winged fruit. According to some authors the east Asiatic genus Pterostyrax should be united with Mohrodendron; but Americans do not accept this view. The plants are handsome shrubs or small trees, with white bell-shaped flowers on slender peduncles, appearing before the leaves, and usually borne on drooping or more or less horizontal branches, forming arches or rows of bells along the under side, and thus giving to the whole plant a beautiful appearance. Two of the three species, M. dipterum and M. parviflorum, are natives of the Gulf and neighboring States. The remaining and best-known species, M. Carolinum, extends as far north as West Virginia and southern Illinois, doing well in the parks of Washington.

Flowers and Fruit of Mohrodendron Carolinum. a, flower cut longitudinally.

Halesiaceæ (hā-lē-si-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Halesia + -aceæ.] A name (Don, 1828) of a family of plants, consisting of Mohrodendron (Halesia) only, now included in the Styracaceæ.

half-royal (häf'roi″al), n. In the paper trade, a kind of millboard or pasteboard of which there are two sizes: small, 20¼ by 13 inches, and large, 21 by 14 inches.

half-saved (häf'sāvd), a. Half-witted. [Prov. Eng. and New Eng.]

He [William Dove] was what is called half-saved. Some of his faculties were more than ordinarily acute, but the power of self-conduct was entirely wanting in him. Southey, The Doctor, x.

half-seas-over (häf'sēz-ō'vėr). 1†. Well on the way; pretty far advanced.

I am half-seas-o'er to death:
And since I must die once, I would be loth
To make a double work of what's half-finish'd.
Dryden.

2. Pretty far gone in drink; half drunk; tipsy.

"Holla, Dick Admiral," cried Neptune, who was pretty far gone in liquor, . . . "I'm going home." "I thought thou wert there all along, being already half-seas-over," said Cary. "Ay, right, Upsee-Dutch." Kingsley, Westward Ho, ii.

half-shell (häf'shel'), n. One shell of a bivalve: as, oysters served on the half-shell (that is, with the upper shell removed, and the oyster served raw on the lower one).

half-shift (häf'shift), n. See shift.

half-shot† (häf'shot), n. A bullet of smaller caliber than that of the musket or harquebus; hence, a light firearm carrying such a bullet. See demi-hag.

half-sighted (häf'sī″ted), a. Seeing imperfectly; having weak discernment.

The officers of the king's household had need be provident, both for his honour and thrift; they must look both ways, else they are but half-sighted. Bacon.

half-sister (häf'sis″tėr), n. [< ME. halfsuster = G. halbschwester = Dan. halvsöster = Sw. halfsyster; < half + sister.] A sister by one parent only.

half-snipe (häf'snīp), n. The European jack-snipe or lesser snipe, Scolopax or Limnocryptes gallinula, the greater snipe being called double-snipe.

half-sole (häf'sōl'), n. That part of the sole of a boot or shoe which extends forward from the shank of the sole to the toe.

half-sole (häf'sōl), v. t. [< half-sole, n.] To repair by putting on a new half-sole: as, to half-sole a shoe.

half-sovereign (häf'sov″e-rin), n. A British gold coin worth 10 shillings, and weighing about 61.6372 grains troy. See sovereign.

half-spade (häf′spād), n. In her., a bearing representing a sharp-pointed spade from which one wing of the blade has been cut away. The blazon should state to which side the remaining part of the blade is turned. Thus if the spade is palewise, it is blazoned "the side of the spade to the sinister or dexter."

half-spear (häf′spēr), n. In her., a spear with a short or truncated handle, used as a bearing.

half-step (häf′step), n. In music, a semitone. See semitone, step, and tone.

half-stitch (häf′stich), n. A loose and open mesh used in pillow-lace making, with which a pattern is outlined and also a simple kind of filling is put in.

half-stop (häf′stop), n. See stop.

half-strained† (häf′strānd), a. Half-bred; imperfect.

> I find I'm but a half-strained villain yet,
> But mungril-mischievous; for my blood boil'd
> To view this brutal act. Dryden.

half-stuff (häf′stuf), n. Any material half formed in the process of manufacture; specifically, a partly prepared pulp in paper-making.

half-suit (häf′sūt), n. The body-armor of the seventeenth century. It consisted exclusively of breastplate, backpiece, articulated épaulières, and articulated tassets, all other iron armor having been abandoned, with the exception of an open helmet.

half-sword (häf′sōrd), n. Half a sword's length.—To be at half-sword, to be at close quarters in a fight with swords.

> I am a rogue if I were not at half-sword with a dozen of them two hours together. Shak., 1 Hen. IV., ii. 4.
>
> I was four several times at half-sword with him, > Twice stood his partizan. Fletcher, Bonduca, v. 2.

halft, n. and v. An erroneous form of haft[1].

half-tangent (häf′tan″jent), n. The tangent of the half-arc. [An improper expression, used in chartography.]

half-terete (häf′tē-rēt″), a. In bot., semicylindrical: an epithet applied to a long narrow body, flat on one side and convex on the other.

half-thought (häf′thât′), n. A superficial opinion. Shaftesbury.

half-throw (häf′thrō), n. Half the stroke or movement, as of a valve or a piston. Also called half-travel.

half-tide (häf′tīd), n. and a. I. n. Half the duration of a single tide; the state of the tide when it is half-way between ebb and flood.

II. a. Half covered by the tide; washed by the waves: as, wet as a half-tide rock: also applied to a low-built vessel over which waves are likely to break.—Half-tide dock, weir, etc. See the nouns.

half-timber (häf′tim″bėr), n. In ship-building, one of the timbers in the cant-bodies which correspond to the lower futtocks in the square body.

half-timbered (häf′tim″bėrd), a. Having the foundations and principal supports of stout timber, but with all the interstices of the front of the building filled in with plaster: applied to houses built in a decorative style extensively used in Europe in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

half-timer (häf′tī″mėr), n. One who works or is engaged in doing something only half the usual or allotted time; specifically, in Great Britain, a pupil in an elementary school who is entitled to partial exemption from attendance while engaged in some proper employment.

half-tint (häf′tint), n. An intermediate color; a middle tint; in painting, a color that is intermediate between the extreme lights and strong shades of a picture. Also half-tone.

half-title (häf′tī″tl), n. The short title of a book placed at the head of the first chapter; also, the title of any subdivision of a book that immediately precedes that subdivision, when ★printed on a full page and in one line.

half-tone (häf′tōn), n. 1. Same as half-tint.—2. See semitone.—3. A picture printed from a plate produced by the half-tone process (which see), or the plate itself.—Half-tone process, a photo-typographic method in which, in the process of photographing the object, a screen consisting of a ruled glass is interposed between the lens and the sensitized plate. From the negative thus made, a positive image is produced upon a prepared metal plate and etched into relief by acids. The screen is designed to give to the etching a surface for printing in relief, similar to a wood-engraving. A common, but in large measure remediable, effect of its use is an undue softening of both lights and shadows with loss of distinctness.

half-tongue (häf′tung), n. [In Law L. jurata de medietate linguæ, a half-tongue jury.] In law, a jury of which one half are aliens, allowed to an alien who is tried on a criminal charge. Such juries have been abolished in England, but are still allowed in some of the United States.

half-trap (häf′trap), n. A sinking bend in a sewer-pipe, in the form of half of the letter S.

half-travel (häf′trav″el), n. Same as half-throw.

half-truth (häf′tröth), n. A proposition or statement only partly true, or which conveys only part of the truth. Mrs. Browning.

half-virtue (häf′vėr″tū), n. A virtue modified by considerations of prudence or conventionality.

> And those half-virtues which the world calls best.
> Lowell, Comm. Ode.

half-way (häf′wā′), adv. In the middle; at half the distance.

> Meets destiny half-way, nor shrinks at death.
> Granville, Imit. of Chorus in Seneca's Thyetus, ii.

To meet half-way. See meet.

half-way (häf′wā), a. Midway; equidistant from the extremes.—Half-way covenant, house, etc. See the nouns.

half-wit (häf′wit′), n. A weak-minded or idiotic person; also, a dolt; a blockhead.

> Half-wits are fleas, so little and so light,
> We scarce could know they live, but that they bite.
> Dryden.

half-witted (häf′wit″ed), a. Weak in intellect; idiotic; silly; foolish.

> Jack had passed for a poor, well-meaning, half-witted, crack-brained fellow; people were strangely surprised to find him in such a roguery. Arbuthnot, Hist. John Bull.

half-word†, n. [ME. halfeword.] A speech conveying an insinuation rather than a direct assertion; a hint.

> She wolde not fonde
> To holde no wyght in balaunce
> By halfe-worde, ne by countenaunce.
> Chaucer, Death of Blanche, l. 1022.

half-yard (häf′yärd′), n. Half of a yard; specifically, an old ale-measure, one half of the ale-yard.

half-yarn (häf′yärn), n. Slub which is spun into yarn.

half-year (häf′yēr′), n. A period of six months; one half of a calendar year; also, half of a school year, whatever its length.

> The Doctor now talking of holiday doings, and then of the prospects of the half-year, what chance there was for the Balliol scholarship, etc.
> T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, ii. 1.

half-yearly (häf′yēr″li), a. Happening twice in a year; semi-annual.

half-yearly (häf′yēr′li), adv. Twice in a year; semi-annually.

halit, a. A Middle English form of holy.

Haliaëtus (hal-i-ā′e-tus), n. [NL. (L. haliœetos), < Gr. ἁλιάετος, poet. ἁλιαίετος, the 'sea-eagle,' prob. the osprey, < ἁλς, the sea, + ἀετός, αἰετός, eagle.] A genus of Falconidæ, containing eagles with bare tarsi; the earns, sea-eagles, or fishing-eagles. The best-known species are the white-tailed sea-eagle of Europe, H. albicilla, and the white-headed or bald eagle of North America, H. leucocephalus. (See cut under eagle.) A species of wide distribution in Europe and Asia is H. leucoryphus. The largest and handsomest of all is the Kamchatkan or pelagic eagle, H. pelagicus, with 14 tail-feathers instead of the usual 12. (See Thalassoaëtus.) The African representative is H. vocifer. The Indian, Pondicherry, or brahminy eagle, formerly H. pondicerianus, is now called Haliastur indus.

haliard, n. See halyard.

halibut, holibut (hol′i-but), n. [The second ★form is etymologically better (cf. holiday); formerly hallibut; < ME. halybutte* (= D. heilbot = G. heiligbutt, heilbutt, heilbutte), a halibut, lit. 'holy (i. e., holiday) plaice,' < ME. haly, E. holy, + butte, a flounder, plaice: see holy and but[2]. Cf. Sw. helgeflundra = Dan. helleflynder, a halibut, lit. 'holy flounder'; so named, it is thought, from being eaten particularly on holidays (holy days). The sense seems to have been lost, and the forms have suffered corruption.] A fish of the genus Hippoglossus, H. hippoglossus, the largest species of the flat-fish family or Pleuronectidæ. This fish has a compressed body, one side being colored, the other white, and both eyes on the same side of the head. It grows to a great size, sometimes weighing from 300 to 400 pounds. It forms an article of food, and some parts of the body are fat, tender, and delicious. The name is also given to various other species of Pleuronectidæ, such as Reinhardtius hippoglossoides, known as the Greenland halibut, and Paralichthys californicus, known in California as the Monterey halibut and bastard halibut.—Circus halibut, the common halibut when accidentally variegated with black and white. [Local, New Eng.]—George's halibut, the common halibut taken on George's Banks.—Grand Bank halibut, the common halibut taken on the Grand Banks.

Halibut (Hippoglossus hippoglossus).
(From Report of U. S. Fish Commission, 1884.)

halibut-broom (hol′i-but-bröm), n. A disgorger for halibut, made of oak, with one end flattened and sharpened.

halibut-slime (hol′i-but-slīm), n. A kind of sea-anemone found on halibut: so called by fishermen, who mistake it for a secretion of the fish.

halibutter, holibutter (hol′i-but-ėr), n. A vessel engaged in the halibut-fishery on the offshore banks; a halibut-catcher. These vessels are clipper-built and schooner-rigged.

Halichœrus (hal-i-kē′rus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἁλς, the sea, + χοῖρος, hog.] A genus of seals, of the family Phocidæ, the type of which is the gray seal, H. gryphus, having the dental formula as in Phoca, but the facial region of the skull large in comparison with the cranial. Nilsson, 1820.

Halichondria (hal-i-kon′dri-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἁλς, the sea, + χόνδρος, cartilage.] A genus of monactinelline sponges, containing the forms known as crumb-of-bread sponge (H. panicea) and mermaid's-glove (H. oculata).

Halichondriidæ (hal′i-kon-drī′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἁλς, the sea, + χόνδρος, gristle, cartilage.] A group of sponges, Spongidæ or Porifera, exemplified by the genus Halichondria, containing many common marine forms which incrust stones, timbers, and seaweeds below the tide-mark, and sometimes shoot up into branching tufts or tubes. They have no commercial value. Also Halichondriæ.

halichondroid (hal-i-kon′droid), a. and n. [< Halichondria + -oid.] I. a. Resembling a sponge of the genus Halichondria; belonging to the Halichondriidæ.

> A very common Halichondroid sponge of this group (Pharetrospongia strahani, Soll.). Encyc. Brit., XXII. 427.

II. n. A sponge of the family Halichondriidæ.

Halicore (ha-lik′ō-rē), n. [NL., < Gr. ἁλς, the sea, + κόρη, maid.] 1. The typical genus of the family Halicoridæ. The male has a pair of large straight tusks in the upper jaw (these being rudimentary and not exserted in the female), directed forward and downward, growing from persistent pulps, enameled, and with beveled ends. There are 5 or 6 molars in each upper and lower half-jaw, which are not all in position at once, the first falling before the last is cut. The skull has a long rostrum bent down at right angles with the cranial axis, and the front of the lower jaw is likewise decurved. There are 7 cervical, 18 or 19 dorsal, and 30 succeeding vertebræ; the tail is emarginate in the middle line, with pointed lateral lobes; there are no nails on the fore limbs; and the cæcum is simple. The genus contains the several species of dugong. Dugungus is a synonym. See cuts under dugong and heart.

2. [l. c.] A species of Halicore; a dugong.

Halicoridæ (hal-i-kor′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Halicore + -idæ.] The family of sirenians of which the halicore or dugong is the type. J. E. Gray, 1825.

Halictus (ha-lik′tus), n. [NL. (Latreille, 1804).] A large, wide-spread, and important genus of small solitary bees, of the family Andrenidæ, containing numerous species, the pregnant females of which hibernate. H. parallelus is a common American species.

Halictus flavipes. (Cross shows natural size.)

halidame† n. An improper form of halidom.

> Come, we must not again disagree; but, by my halidame, I think one troubadour roundel worth all that Petrarch ever wrote. Bulwer, Rienzi, p. 163.

halidom†, halidome† (hal′i-dum, -dōm), n. [Archaic, pronounced prop., in first element, as in holiday, holibut or halibut; early mod. E. also hallidome (and sometimes, erroneously, holidame, supposed to refer to the Virgin Mary); < ME. halidom, halydom, halizdom, holiness, sanctity, a sanctuary, sacred relic, < AS. hāligdōm, holiness, sanctity, a sanctuary, sacred thing or relic (= D. heiligdom = OHG. heiligtuom, MHG. heilectuom, G. heiligtum, a sanctuary, sacred thing or relic, = Icel. helgidōmr, a sanctuary, holy relic, = Dan. helligdom = Sw. helgedom, a sanctuary), < hālig, holy, + -dōm, E. -dom.] 1. Holiness; sanctity; sacred honor; also, something regarded as sacred, as a relic: formerly much used in solemn oaths or adjurations.

It was ordeyned ferst be Peres of Weston, and be alle tho that han be sithyn, that alle these Comenauntz a-forsaid sshulle ben holden ferme and stable: and ther-to harn thei sworon on the halidom.
English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 36.

"Now sure, and by my hallidome" (quoth he),
"Ye a great master are in your degree."
Spenser, Mother Hub. Tale, l. 545.

Bap. Now, by my holidame, here comes Katharina!
Kath. What is your will, sir, that you send for me?
Shak., T. of the S., v. 2.

2. A sanctuary; a holy place; a chapel; also, a holy thing; a relic.

The men of the Halidome, as it was called, of St. Mary's.
Scott, Monastery, ii.

★ halieutics (hal-i-ū′tiks), n. [< L. halieutica (the title of a poem on fishing, by Ovid), < Gr. ἁλιευτικά (the title of a poem by Oppian), neut. pl. (cf. ἁλιευτική, sc. τέχνη, the art of fishing, fem. sing.) of ἁλιευτικός, of or for fishing (cf. ἁλιευτής, and ἁλιεύς, a fisher), < ἁλιεύειν, fish, be a fisher, < ἅλς, the sea.] A treatise on fishes, or on the art of fishing: as, the Halieutics of Oppian.

Halifax law or inquest. See law[1].

Haliidæ (ha-lī′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Halia + -idæ.] A family of gastropods, generally referred to the order Toxoglossa, represented by the genus Halia. The shell is so much like that of Achatina that it was long regarded as a terrestrial form. A single living species is known, inhabiting deep water about the Spanish coast, especially near Cadiz. It also occurs in the Tertiary formation of Italy.

Halimasst, n. An obsolete form of Hallowmas.

Halimeda (hal-i-mē′dä), n. [NL. (Lamoureux, 1812), appar. irreg. < Gr. ἅλς, the sea, + μήδιον, some plant.] A genus of calcareous green-spored marine algæ, of the order Siphonales of some authors. The fronds are jointed, and resemble cacti. The best-known species is H. Opuntia, found in the Atlantic and Pacific oceans and the Mediterranean sea. Lindley made this genus the type of the tribe Halimedidæ. Sometimes written Halymeda.

Halimedeæ (hal-i-mē′dē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Decaisne, 1842), < Halimeda + -eæ.] A name formerly used for a group of algæ, consisting of the two genera Halimeda and Udotea.

Halimedidæ (hal-i-med′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Halimeda + -idæ.] In Lindley's system of botanical classification, a tribe of the Confervaceæ having the frond polysiphonous, made up of tubes which are continuous or jointed, and more or less densely branched. Sometimes written Halymedidæ. See Halimeda.

halimotet, n. Same as hallmote.

Halimus (hal′i-mus), n. [NL. (Wallroth, 1822), < Gr. ἁλιμος, of the sea, marine, < ἅλς, the sea.] 1. A genus of maritime plants, of the family Chenopodiaceæ, now reduced to a section of Atriplex.—2. [l. c.] Atriplex Halimus, a well-known plant of the south European coasts.

haliographer (hal-i-og′ra-fėr), n. [< haliography + -er[1].] One who writes about the sea. Bailey, 1727.

haliography (hal-i-og′ra-fi), n. [Better haligraphy*, < Gr. ἅλς (in comp. usually ἁλι-), the sea, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] A description of the sea. See thalassography. Bailey, 1731.

Haliomma (hal-i-om′ä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἅλς, the sea, + ὄμμα, eye.] The typical genus of Haliommatidæ. It is referred by some to the Sphæridæ.

Haliommatidæ (hal″i-o-mat′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Haliomma(t-) + -idæ.] A family of radiolarians, named from the genus Haliomma.

Haliotidæ (hal-i-ot′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Haliotis + -idæ.] A family of gastropods, typified by the genus Haliotis, containing the sea-ears, ear-shells, abalones, or ormers. The animal has a short muzzle and subulate tentacles, two branchial plumes, and a margin developing a posterior (oval) fold or siphon which occupies the slit or perforation in the shell. The shell is ear-shaped and flatly spiral, with the aperture almost coextensive with the shell and limited only by the flattened columellar area; the back near the outer margin is perforated by a row of holes. See abalone.

Haliotis (hal-i-ō′tis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἅλς, the sea, + οὖς (ὠτ-) = E. ear[1].] The typical genus of the family Haliotidæ; the ear-shells: so called from the excessive width of the aperture and the flatness of the small spire, which give it an ear-like or saucer-shaped figure. They are mostly tropical or subtropical, and have commercial value as ornaments and as furnishing a mother-of-pearl used in inlaying, etc. The animal is used for food. See abalone.

Longitudinal Section (idealized) of Haliphysema, an extant Gastræa-form.
The egg-cells (e) are enlarged epithelial cells of the endoderm (g), and lie freely in the primitive intestinal cavity (d); m, mouth-opening; h, exoderm, incrusted below with grains of sand, above with sponge-spicules. (From Haeckel's "Evolution of Man.") haliotoid (hal-i-ō′toid), a. [< Haliotis + -oid.] Like an ear-shell; resembling or pertaining to the Haliotidæ.

Haliphysema (hal″i-fi-sē′mä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἅλς, the sea, + φύσημα, that which is blown up, a bubble, a half-formed shell, etc., < φυσᾶν, blow up, inflate.] A genus of Foraminifera, formerly regarded as sponges of extremely simple structure, resembling a gastrula. The animal is spindle-shaped, and the body was considered to consist of two single layers of cells, an endoderm and an ectoderm inclosing a central cavity with a mouth at one end, the other end being fixed to some object. The outer layer of cells is coalescent, and includes foreign substances, as sponge-spicules. It was one of two genera of chalk-sponges constituting an order Physemaria of the class Calcispongiæ.

Haliplana (ha-lip′lā-nä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἅλς, the sea, + πλάνος, wandering: see planet.] A genus of sea-swallows, of the subfamily Sterninæ; the sooty terns. H. fuliginosa is the common sooty tern or egg-bird of the United States. The genus is often merged in Sterna. J. Wagler, 1832.

haliplid (hal′i-plid), n. A beetle of the family Haliplidæ.

Haliplidæ (ha-lip′li-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Haliplus + -idæ.] A family of hydradephagous beetles. The metasternum has an antecoxal piece separated by a well-marked suture reaching from one side to the other and extending in a triangular process between the hind coxæ: the antennæ are 10-jointed; the hind coxæ are fixed; and large plates almost entirely conceal the abdomen. They are minute oval and very convex water-beetles, of a yellow color spotted with black. They are often united with the Dytiscidæ. Kirby, 1837.

Haliplus (hal′i-plus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἁλίπλους, contr. of ἁλίπλοος, sailing on the sea, also covered with water, < ἅλς, the sea, + πλεῖν, sail.] The typical genus of Haliplidæ. H. fasciatus is an example. Latreille.

Haliscoleina (hal-i-skō-lē-ī′nä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἅλς, the sea, + σκώληξ (σκωληκ-), a worm, esp. the earthworm.] In Gegenbaur's system of classification, a group of marine chætopodous worms, represented by such genera as Polyophthalmus and Capitella: distinguished from the earthworms, or Scoleina.

Halistemma (hal-i-stem′ä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἅλς, the sea, + στέμμα, a fillet, crown.] The typical genus of Halistemmatidæ, having a spirally coiled saccule, a single terminal filament, and no involucre. Huxley, 1859.

Halistemmatidæ (hal″i-ste-mat′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Halistemma(t-) + -idæ.] A family of physophorous hydrozoans, of the class Siphonophora, typified by the genus Halistemma.

halite (hal′īt), n. [< Gr. ἅλς, salt, + -ite[2].] In mineral., native rock-salt.

halitheriid (hal-i-thē′ri-id), n. A fossil sirenian, one of the Halitheriidæ.

Halitheriidæ (hal″i-thē-rī′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Halitherium + -idæ.] A family of fossil sirenians from the Miocene and early Pliocene, typified by the genus Halitherium, representing a generalized type of sirenians. They had large tusk-like upper incisors, as in Halicore, and an ossified femur articulated with the pelvis. Remains of individuals of the family have been found in many places in Europe, and several genera have been separated from Halitherium, which formerly included all the extinct sirenians.

Halitherium (hal-i-thē′ri-um), n. [NL. (Kaup), < Gr. ἅλς, the sea, + θηρίον, a beast.] A genus of extinct Sirenia from the Miocene, the type of the family Halitheriidæ. It appears to have possessed distinct though small hind limbs, no trace of which has been found in any of the existing sirenians. Also spelled Halytherium.

halituous (ha-lit′ū-us), a. [< L. halitus (halitu-), breath: see halitus.] 1†. Like breath; vaporous.

Part of it, being cast upon a live coal, did by its blue and halituous flame discover itself to be of the nature of that salt. Boyle, Works, I. 363.

2. In pathol., moist as if from being breathed upon: said of the skin when covered with a slight moisture.

halitus (hal′i-tus), n. [L., < halare, breathe: see inhale, exhale[1].] In physiol., the breath; also, the vapor exhaled in the cavities of a living and warm body, so long as the blood is warm.—Halitus of the blood (sanguinis), the odorous vapor exhaled by newly drawn blood.

halkt, n. [Early mod. E. also halke, haulke; < ME. halke, a corner, recess, < AS. healc, healoc, a hollow. Cf. AS. heal, a corner; holc, holoc, a hollow: see holk. The relations of these forms to one another, and to AS. holh, hollow, are not clear: see hollow[1].] A nook, corner, recess, or hiding-place.

Inne he com unto a privy halke.
Chaucer, Good Women, l. 1780.

Unknowne to vs, saue only by thy bookes?
Chau. In haulks, and herne, God wot, and in exile,
Where none vouchsaft to yeeld me words or lookes.
Speght, The Reader to Geffrey Chaucer (1598).

halket (hal′ket), n. [Origin obscure.] The large gray seal, Halichærus gryphus.

hall (hâl), n. [Early mod. E. also halle; < ME. halle, haule, < AS. heall, heal = OS. halla = D. MLG. halle = OHG. halla, MHG. halle (G. halle, revived after E.) = Icel. höll (often spelled hall, without umlaut) = Sw. hall = Dan. hal (cf. OF. hale, F. halle = It. alla, < MHG.), a hall, applied in early use to any large room, with closed or open sides; prob. lit. 'a cover' or place of shelter, from the root of AS. helan, ME. helen, E. heal[2], cover: see heal[2], conceal.] 1. A building, or a large room or compartment in a building, devoted to some public or common use: in various special applications. See below.

Whan he was at London, a haule he did vp wright.
First thouht & founden, for chambre was it right.
Robert of Brunne, p. 88.

Then ye souldiers of the debite toke Jesus vnto the comon hall and gathered vnto hym all the companye.
Bible of 1551, Mat. xxvii. 27.

Specifically—(a) In medieval palaces and castles, the main room, often the only living-room. Besides the hall in very early times, even in the greatest houses, there were only a few sleeping-rooms, and not always these. In such a hall the lord and his family, retainers, servants, and visitors were all accommodated, and all public and household affairs were carried on. Later rooms more retired were added, but throughout the feudal period the hall remained the common center of activity. Westminster Hall in London was originally a part of the royal palace, where all the common life of the royal court was conducted and the king dispensed justice. This great room continued to be the principal seat of justice in England till 1820.

Ful sooty was hire bour and eek hire halle.
Chaucer, Nun's Priest's Tale, l. 12.

The great [Westminster] Hall was built by William Rufus, or possibly rebuilt; a room of that description being too necessary an appendage to a palace ever to have been neglected. Pennant, London, p. 114.

Hence—(b) In Great Britain: (1) A manor-house; the proprietor's residence on a large landed estate: also to some extent an American use, especially in the South.

Kate, the prettiest Kate in Christendom,
Kate of Kate Hall. Shak., T. of the S., ii. 1.

So pass I hostel, hall, and grange,
By bridge and ford, by park and pale.
Tennyson, Sir Galahad.

(2) The public or common room of a manor-house, serving as a general meeting- and reception-room, and in which justices' courts were formerly held. (3) A mercantile building or room for the sale of particular articles or goods on account of their owners or producers; a place of sale or of business for a trade or gild: as, a hardware hall; Goldsmiths' Hall or Stationers' Hall in London.

To Loriners' [Bit-makers'] Hall, by Mooregate, a hall I never heard of before. Pepys, Diary, III. 443.

As regards silver-plate, the Hall in London refuses to stamp any poorer alloy. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 71.

(c) An edifice in which courts of justice are held or legal archives are preserved: as, Westminster Hall; the Hall of Records in New York.

1 Gent. Whither away so fast?
2 Gent. . . . Even to the hall, to hear what shall become Of the great duke of Buckingham.
Shak., Hen. VIII., ii. 1.

(d) A room or building devoted to public business or entertainment, or to meetings of public or corporate bodies: as, a town hall; an association hall; a music-hall. (e) The main building of a college, and in some instances, as at Oxford and Cambridge in England, the specific name of a college. The number of colleges called halls (a term which, as well as house, was originally applied to the residence of the college scholars) in these universities, once considerable, is now small and diminishing.

In colleges and halls, in ancient days, . . .
There dwelt a sage call'd Discipline.
Cowper, Task, ii. 699.

Halls, or places of licensed residence for students, also began to be established [in the thirteenth century].
Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 837.

(f) In English colleges: (1) The large room in which the students dine in common. Hence—(2) The students' dinner.

Hall lasts about three quarters of an hour. Two Scholars conclude the performances by reading a long Latin grace. C. A. Bristed, English University, p. 37.

Hall is at five o'clock. Macmillan's Magazine.

(g) In American colleges: (1) A room or building appropriated to the meetings of a literary or other society; also, the society itself.

These [Clio and Whig Halls in the College of New Jersey] were the prototypes, and are the most vigorous survivals, of what, for nearly a century, were the most flourishing and numerous of student societies — the twin literary societies, or halls, generally secret, and always intense in mutual rivalry, which have been institutions at every leading college in the land.
The Century, XXXVI. 751.

(2) One of the buildings in which students sleep; a dormitory.

2. An entranceway or passageway in a house leading to or communicating with its different parts.

Anne ran up the path toward the front door, and entered the dark hall. C. F. Woolson, Anne, i.

A hall! a hall! an exclamation formerly used at masks or other entertainments in order to make room in a crowd for an exhibition or a dance, or to call people together for any ceremony or spectacle, or to summon servants: equivalent to a ring! a ring! as now used.

A hall, a hall! whist, still be mum,
For now with silver song they come.
Chapman, Gentleman Usher, ii. 1.

A hall! a hall! who's without, there? [Enter two or three with cushions.] Come on; y'are proper grooms, are ye not? . . . Their honours are upon coming, and the room not ready. Chapman, Widow's Tears.

The Monarch lightly turned away,
And to his nobles loud did call — Lords, to the dance — a hall! a hall!
Scott, Marmion, v. 17.

Apothecaries' Hall. See apothecary. — Bachelor's or bachelor hall, an establishment presided over by a man (especially an unmarried man) or by men only.

The dishes having been set upon the table by a slipshod old woman, they were left to enjoy it [dinner] after their own manner. "Bachelor's Hall, you know, cousin," said Mr. Jonas. Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit, xi.

Divinity hall. See divinity. — Hall of Eblis. See Eblis. — Liberty hall, a place where every one can do as he likes.

Gentlemen, pray be under no restraint in this house; this is Liberty-Hall, gentlemen; you may do just as you please here. Goldsmith, She Stoops to Conquer, ii.

hallabaloo (hal″a-ba-lö′), n. Same as hullabaloo.

hallage (hâ′lāj), n. [= F. hallage; < hall + -age.] In Great Britain, the toll paid for goods or merchandise vended in a mercantile hall.

hallan (hal′an), n. [Also hallen, hallon, halland; origin uncertain; perhaps orig. applied to the stone at the threshold; cf. Sw. häll, a flat stone, Goth. hallus, a rock.] A partition between the door of a cottage and the fireplace, serving to shelter the inner part of the house from the cold air when the door is opened. [North. Eng. and Scotch.]

He lifted the latch without ceremony, and . . . found himself behind the hallan or partition.
Scott, Bride of Lammermoor, xii.

hallanshaker (hal′an-shā″kėr), n. A beggar who stands shaking the hallan, waiting for alms; a beggarly knave; a low fellow. [Scotch.]

Tho' I were a laird of tenscore acres, Nodding to jouks of hallanshakers. Ramsay.

hall-Bible (hâl′bī′bl), n. A large Bible used for family worship, and kept in the hall or principal apartment of the house. [Scotch.]

The sire turns o'er, wi' patriarchal grace,
The big ha'-bible, ance his father's pride.
Burns, Cottar's Saturday Night.

hall-day†, n. A court-day. Nares.

An hall day: a court day: a day of pleading, as in terme time at Westminster hall, &c. Nomenclator (1585).

hallecret, halecret (hal′e-kret), n. [OF. hallecret, halecret, halcret, alecret, allecret, alacret, alcret = Bret. halacred (Roquefort); of uncertain origin.] A corselet, or a partial suit of armor, in use toward the end of the sixteenth century. It is defined by Cotgrave as "a corselet." According to Meyrick (approved by Burgess and Cosson, Arch. Jour., XXXVII.), the hallecret was a half-suit of light plate-armor worn alike by footmen and horsemen, furnished with long tassets. According to Demmin, it was a gorget with épaulières attached.

hälleflinta (hel-e-flin′tä), n. [Sw., < häll, dial. hall (= Dan. helle, a boulder, also a slope, declivity, = Norw. hall, a boulder, esp. a small boulder, as a cobblestone, = Icel. hallr, a stone, boulder, also a slope, declivity, = Goth. hallus, a rock), + flinta, etc., = E. flint.] A very fine-grained variety of gneiss, generally free from mica: a Swedish term. It is sometimes banded and sometimes porphyritic. It resembles many rocks elsewhere called eurite and felsite.

The general aspect of this rock recalls to my mind those hälleflintas of Treffgarn and Roche Castle.
Quar. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLIV. 228.

hälleflintoid (hel-e-flin′toid), a. [< hälleflinta + -oid.] Of or resembling hälleflinta.

The great hälleflintoid mass which . . . forms the western slopes of Brynian Bangor.
Quar. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLIV. 279.

hallel (hal′el), n. [Heb., praise.] In Jewish ritual, the hymn of praise, beginning in the original with the word halleluiah, 'Praise ye the Lord,' and consisting of Psalms cxiii. to cxviii. inclusive, chanted in the temple while the Passover lambs were being slain, and also at the Passover supper. This hallel or song of praise, called the Egyptian hallel because the slaying of the Passover lambs was first commanded in Egypt, was also chanted at the sacrifice on the first day of the Passover, after the morning sacrifice on the feast of Pentecost, on the eight days of the feast of Tabernacles, and on the eight days of the feast of the Dedication. It also forms part of the present Jewish ritual and is chanted in the synagogue not only on the above-named festivals but also at the beginning of the Jewish (lunar) month and Passover eve, etc.

halleluiah, hallelujah (hal-ē-lö′yä), interj. [Also alleluia; < LL. hallelujah, alleluiah, after Gr. ἀλληλοϊία, repr. Heb. halelujāh, praise ye Jehovah, < halelu, praise ye (< halal, shine, which in one 'voice' (stem) means 'praise'), + Jāh, a short form of Jehovah: see Jehovah. The j or i represents the consonant yodh, equiv. to the E. consonant y; so in other words of Heb. origin, as proper names, where, however, j has conformed in sound to the assibilated j of L. or F. origin, as Jehovah, Jesus, Joseph, Jordan, etc.] 1. Praise ye the Lord: a word used in songs of praise or pious rejoicing, or in solemn ascriptions of thanksgiving to God. It is also used as a noun. It occurs in the English Bible only in Rev. xix. 1, 3, 4, 6, and then in the Greek form, as alleluia. This is the form employed in liturgical usage. It is found in liturgies and offices from very early times. Its most prominent liturgical use is that after the epistle and before the gospel in both the Eastern and Western churches. (See gradual and jubilation.) In the Mozarabic rite it follows the gospel. (See Lauda.) There are probably traces of an original, perhaps Jewish, use of halleluiah before and after psalms. The Greek Church has a triple "Alleluia" at the end of the cherubic hymn. In the day-hours of the same church it is said after the gloria at the end of stases or portions of psalms. In the Western Church it succeeds the gloria after the versicles at the beginning of the several hours. In Western usage alleluia is not said from Septuagesima to Easter eve.

I heard a great voice of much people in heaven, saying, Allelúia; Salvation, and glory, and honour, and power, unto the Lord our God. Rev. xix. 1.

Angels peep round to view this mystick thing,
And Halleluiah round, all Halleluiah sing.
Cowley, Davideis, ii.

And the empyrean rung with Halleluiahs.
Milton, P. L., vii. 634.

2. Specifically, a musical composition wholly or principally based upon the word halleluiah: as, the Halleluiah (chorus) in Handel's "Messiah" or in Beethoven's "Mount of Olives." — Common halleluiah meter. Same as common long meter (which see, under common).

halleluiah, hallelujah (hal-ē-lö′yä), n. 1. See halleluiah, interj. — 2. In bot., same as alleluia, 2.

halleluiatic, hallelujatic (hal″ē-lö-yat′ik), a. [< LL. hallelujaticus (sc. psalmus), containing halleluiahs, < halleluiah, hallelujah, q. v.] Of or pertaining to the halleluiah. Also alleluiatic. — Halleluiatic sequence, the hymn beginning with the words, "The strain upraise of joy and praise."

hallen (hal′en), n. See hallan.

Halleria (ha-lē′ri-ä), n. [NL., named in honor of Albrecht von Haller (1708–77), a Swiss botanist and physiologist.] A genus of shrubs, belonging to the family Scrophulariaceæ, having opposite leaves, a cup-shaped calyx, short-lobed red corolla, exserted stamens, and an indehiscent berry-like fruit. It embraces 8 species, natives of South Africa, Madagascar, and Abyssinia. One of these, H. lucida, of the Cape of Good Hope, is known as the white olive or African fly-honeysuckle. It is an evergreen shrub, 12 to 14 feet in height and 6 to 8 inches in diameter. The wood is fine-grained, hard, and tough, and is used for wagon-tongues, planes, screws, joiners' benches, etc.

Halleriaceæ (ha-lē-ri-ā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Link, 1829), < Halleria + -aceæ.] A division of the Scrophulariaceæ or figwort family of plants, embracing the genus Halleria only.

Hallerieæ (hal-ē-rī′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Don, 1838), < Halleria + -eæ.] Same as Halleriaceæ.

hall-house (hâl′hous), n. A manor-house; the habitation of a landed proprietor.

There were mair fules in the laird's ha'-house than Davie Gellatley. Scott, Waverley, x.

hallian, n. See hallion.

halliard, n. See halyard.

hallidome†, n. Same as halidom. Spenser.

hallier[1]†, n. [< hall + -ier.] A university student belonging to a hall.

The students also that remaine in them are called hostelers or halliers. Holinshed, Descrip. of Eng., iii.

hallier[2] (hal′i-ėr), n. [For halier*, < hale[1], haul, + -ier[1]. Cf. haler, hauler.] 1. One who hales or hauls, as for hire. [Prov. Eng.] — 2. A kind of net for catching birds.

halling[1]† (hâ′ling), n. [< hall + -ing[1].] A suit of hangings, tapestry, or the like, for a hall.

Where the sayd thre kynges sat crowned all,
The best hallynge hanged as reason was,
Whereon were wrought the ix orders angelical.
Bradshaw, tr. of Life of St. Werburgh.

halling[2] (hâ′ling), n. [Norw.] 1. A Norwegian country-dance in triple rhythm. — 2. Music for such a dance.

hallion, hallian (hal′yon, -iän), n. [Formerly also hallynge. Origin unknown.] 1. A clown; a rogue; a worthless, idle fellow.

They took their departure, shabby hallions, by a side passage. Carlyle, in Froude.

2. An overbearing, quarrelsome, and vulgar woman. Jamieson.

hall-mark (hâl′märk), n. 1. In England, an official stamp put upon articles made of gold and silver as an evidence of genuineness: so called from Goldsmiths' Hall in London, the seat of the Goldsmiths' Company, by whom the stamping is legally regulated. It consists of various marks placed close together, as follows: (1) the mark indicating the standard, as, for silver of the new standard, a figure of Britannia and a lion's head erased; (2) the mark of the assay-town, as a crown for Sheffield or an anchor for Birmingham; (3) a mark denoting that the duty has been paid; (4) the date-mark, consisting of a letter of the alphabet for each year, in series of differing style or design; (5) the maker's mark, usually two or more initial letters; (6) the workman's mark, which is not always present.

Hence — 2. Any mark of genuineness, good quality, or respectability.

And this is the hall-mark of all true science, that it destroys by fulfilling. Nineteenth Century, XIX. 209.

Landor, however, would not admit into his pages any word or phrase which lacked the hallmark of the best writers. The Literary Era, II. 165.

hall-mark (hâl′märk), v. t. [< hall-mark, n.] To assay and stamp, as with the official mark of the Goldsmiths' Company.

Inasmuch as all articles of gold and silver made in London have to be assayed and stamped at Goldsmiths' Hall, the assay-marks have come to be called "hall-marks." The term has become so popular that a facetious writer in the Quarterly Review, April, 1888 (p. 281), speaks of the Council of Trent as "hall-marking" the Vulgate.
N. and Q., 7th ser., VI. 167.

Guaranteeing of quality by inspection has been shown, in the hall-marking of silver, to be superfluous, while the silver trade has been decreased by it.
H. Spencer, Man vs. State, p. 57.

hallmote†, n. [AS. law-term, < hall + mote, ME. form of AS. gemōt, E. moot, a meeting.] A lord's court or court baron, dealing with the affairs and doings of tenants or feudal subjects. Appeal could be had to the county courts and even to the king's courts.

Private courts were held, when practicable, in the house of the lord having jurisdiction, as is shown by the name halimote or hall-moot . . . by way of contrast with the open-air hundred and county courts. The manor house itself is still known as a court in many places.
Maitland and Pollock, Hist. Eng. Law, i. 38, 590.

hallo (ha-lō′), interj. [In early mod. E. also written hallow, halow, alow, and even a lo; ME. halow; in mod. E. also hello, hullo, and halloo, q. v. Such forms, being mere syllables to call attention, are freely varied for sonorous effect; hallo, hello, halloo, may be regarded as the mod. representatives of the common AS. eá lā or eálā, used similarly to call attention, whether loudly from afar, like hallo, hello, halloo, or quietly from near by, like hello colloquially, or like mod. ah, oh, well, and similar preliminary syllables. AS. eá represents E. ah or oh, and lā is E. lo. These forms, in hunting use, are represented by OF. halle, an interjection of cheering or setting on of a dog, mod. F. haler, set (dogs upon one), encourage with shouts. So G. hallo, halloh, perhaps after the E. The form hallow, as a noun or verb, with accent on the first syllable, is a var. of hollow, hollo, holla, now scarcely used as an interj., and is in so far different from hallo, hello: see holla, hollow[2], etc. Cf. hallabaloo, hullabaloo, etc., F. halali, a hunting-cry, etc.] An exclamation used to call attention: same as hello, hullo, now more common colloquially, and as halloo, which differs more in pronunciation and use. See hello and halloo.

hallo†, v. t. [< ME. halowen; cf. OF. halloer, also haller, halloo in pursuit, incite with cries; from the interj.: see hallo, interj., and cf. halloo, v., hollo, hollow[2], v.] To call or shout to; incite with cries.

halloo (ha-lö′), interj. [A sonorous variant of hallo, suited to a prolonged cry intended to be heard at a distance.] An exclamation used to call the attention of a person at a distance, or in hunting to incite the dogs.

> Pillicock sat on pillicock hill;—
> Halloo, halloo, loo, loo! Shak., Lear, iii. 4.
>
> Some popular chief,
> More noisy than the rest, but cries halloo,
> And, in a trice, the bellowing herd come out.
> Dryden.
>
> Halloo, my fancie, halloo!
> Stay, stay at home with me;
> I can thee no longer follow,
> For thou hast betrayed me
> And bewrayed me!
> It is too much for thee.

>
> I knocked at various doors, and hallooed loudly, until a sleepy farmer made his appearance.
> B. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 394.

II. trans. 1. To call or shout to; incite or chase with shouts and cries of "Halloo!"

> Old John hallooes his hounds again. Prior, Alma, ii.
>
> If I fly, Marcius,
> Halloo me like a hare. Shak., Cor., i. 8.

2. To cry aloud; utter with shouts.

> Halloo [var. holla] your name to the reverberate hills,
> And make the babbling gossip of the air > Cry out, Olivia! Shak., T. N., i. 5.

halloo (ha-lö′ or hal′ö), n. A call, cry, or shout uttered to attract attention, or as a signal, as in hunting to urge on the dogs.

> When as they find their speed avails them nought,
> Upon the toils run headlong without fear,
> With noise of hounds, and hallоos as distraught.
> Drayton, Barons' Wars, ii.
>
> List, list; I hear
> Some far-off halloo break the silent air.
> Milton, Comus, l. 481.

Hallopoda (ha-lop′ō-dạ), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of Hallopus as an adj.: see Hallopus.] A primary division or suborder of dinosaurian reptiles, instituted for the family Hallopodidæ. O. C. Marsh, 1882.

Hallopodidæ (hal-ō-pod′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hallopus (-pod-) + -idæ.] A family of dinosaurian reptiles with amphicœlous vertebræ, the feet digitigrade and unguiculate, the fore limbs very small, the hind feet tridactyl, with greatly elongated metatarsals and the calcaneum much produced backward.

Hallopus (hal′ō-pus), n. [NL., for allopus*, < Gr. ἄλλος, other, + πούς (ποδ-) = E. foot; appar. in allusion to the difference in the feet.] The typical genus of the family Hallopodidæ.

hallotype (hal′ō-tīp), n. Same as hellenotype.

hallow[1] (hal′ō), n. [< ME. halowe, haloghe, haloe, halewe, halze, halwe, a saint, < AS. hāliga, hālga, a saint, def. form of hālig, holy (so saint, orig. adj. sanctus, holy): similarly in other Teut. tongues: see holy. Cf. hallow[1], v.] A saint; a holy person; an apostle: now hardly used except historically, or as in Hallowe'en, Hallowmas, All-hallows, etc.

> Now God, quod he, and alle his halwes bryghte,
> So wisly on my soule as have mercy.
> Chaucer, Man of Law's Tale, l. 962.
>
> By God and by his halwes twelve.
> Chaucer, Death of Blanche, l. 831.
>
> It was as he put his spear in rest, and pricked his steed forward to the charge, that England's knight asked his Saviour's forgiveness, and begged St. Mary and all hallows to pray for him. Rock, Church of our Fathers, III. i. 226.
>
> Men said openly that Christ slept and His hallows.
> E. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, V. 189.

hallow[1] (hal′ō), v. t. [< ME. halowen, halewen, halwen, halzen, halgien, < AS. hālgian (= OS. hēlagōn = D. heiligen = OHG. heilagōn, MHG. G. heiligen = Icel. Hallow-day† (hal′ō-dā), n. All Saints' day.

> This night is Hallowe'en, Janet,
> The morn is Hallowday.
> The Young Tamlane (Child's Ballads, I. 120).

Hallowe'en, Hallow-eve (hal-ō-ēn′, -ēv′), n. [Also written Halloween; short for Allhallowe'en, etc., All-hallows' even: see All-hallows, All-hallown, All-hallon, etc. Cf. Hallowmas.] The evening of October 31st, as the eve or vigil of All-hallows or All Saints' day. Hallowe'en is an occasion of certain popular superstitions and observances in many Christian countries, fairies, witches, and imps of all kinds being supposed to be then especially active. In Scotland, as related in Burns's "Halloween," the evening is frequently celebrated by meetings of young people of both sexes, when various mystical or playful ceremonies are performed with the view of revealing future husbands or wives. The form Hallow-even is rare.

> "This night is hallow-eve," he said,
> "And to-morrow is hallow-day."
> Sir Roland (Child's Ballads, I. 224).
>
> Some merry, friendly country folks

Hallow-fair (hal′ō-fār), n. [< hallow[1], n. (with ref. to Hallow-eve, All-hallows), + fair[2].] A market held in November. [Scotch.]

Hallowmas, Hallowmass (hal′ō-mas), n. [Short for All-hallows' mass, AS. ealra hālgena mæsse-dæg, all saints' mass-day. Cf. Hallowe'en, All-hallows, etc.] The feast of All Saints; All Saints' day, namely, the 1st of November.

> I beseech you, look into master Froth here, sir; a man of fourscore pound a-year; whose father died at Hallowmas. Was 't not at Hallowmas, master Froth?
> Shak., M. for M., ii. 1.

Hallow-tide (hal′ō-tīd), n. [Short for Allhallow-tide, ME. alle halowene tid: see Allhallowtide.] Same as Allhallow-tide.

halloysite (ha-loi′zīt), n. [Named after J. B. J. d'Omalius d'Halloy (1783–1875), a Belgian geologist.] A clay-like, earthy mineral with waxy or dull luster, white or slightly colored, and having a conchoidal fracture. It is a hydrous silicate of aluminium.

hallucal (hal′ū-kạl), a. [< hallux (halluc-) + -al.] Of or pertaining to the hallux: as, hallucal muscles; the hallucal or accessory metatarsal of a bird.

halluces, n. Plural of hallux.

hallucinate (ha-lū′si-nāt), v.; pret. and pp. hallucinated, ppr. hallucinating. [< L. hallucinatus, allucinatus, better alucinatus, pp. of hallucinari, allucinari, better alucinari, wander in mind, dream, talk idly, prate.] I.† intrans. To blunder.

> The very consideration of human infirmity is not sufficient to excuse such teachers of others, who hallucinate or prevaricate in this.
> Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 122.
>
> Adorning richly, for the poet's sake,
> Some poor hallucinating scribe's mistake.
> Byrom, Epistle to a Friend.

II. trans. To affect with hallucination.

> But my subject C, although he could easily be hallucinated in any desired way, seemed always very drowsy and slow of response during his trance.
> Amer. Soc. Psych. Research, I. 248, note.
>
> The hallucinated person not only imagined such and such a thing, but imagined that he saw such and such a thing. E. Gurney, Eng. Soc. Psych. Research, III. 155.

★hallucination (ha-lū-si-nā′shon), n. [= F. hallucination = Sp. alucinación = Pg. allucinação = It. allucinazione, < L. hallucinatio(n-), allucinatio(n-), better alucinatio(n-), < alucinari, wander in mind, dream, talk idly: see hallucinate.]

1. An unfounded notion; belief in an unreality; a baseless or distorted conception.

> This must have been the hallucination of the transcriber, who probably mistook the dash of the I for a T. Addison.

2. In pathol. and psychol., the apparent perception of some external thing to which no real object corresponds. The mistaking of a bush for a bear in the dark is not hallucination, but only illusion; but the hearing of a voice when no sensible acoustic vibrations strike the ear is a very common hallucination. Hallucination may be of sight only, or of hearing only, or of both together. It may be consistent with perfect sanity and the absence of any false belief, and may even become an object of observation and study to the person affected.

> For if vision be abolished, it is called cæcitas, or blindness; if depraved, and receive its objects erroneously, hallucination. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 18.
>
> Illusion and hallucination shade one into the other much too gradually for us to draw any sharp line of demarcation between them. J. Sully, Illusions, p. 111.
>
> Hallucinations of the senses are first distinguished from other hallucinations by the fact that they do not necessarily imply any false belief.
> E. Gurney, Eng. Soc. Psych. Research, III. 151.
>
> During the operation my chamber was filled with human figures of all kinds. This hallucination continued uninterruptedly till half after four, at which time digestion commenced. Nicolai, tr., in Nicholson's Journal.

=Syn. Delusion, Illusion (see delusion); phantasm.

hallucinator (ha-lū′si-nā-tor), n. [< LL. hallucinator, alucinator, < alucinari: see hallucinate.] One who acts under hallucination; a blunderer. North British Rev. [Rare.]

hallucinatory (ha-lū′si-nā-tō-ri), a. [< hallucinate + -ory.] Partaking of or producing hallucination.

> Hallucinatory portraits are seen on blank cards, or on cards already photographed with entirely different faces.
> Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 498.
>
> A prism placed before the more normal eye doubles the hallucinatory image, and makes one of the images undergo a deviation in conformity to the laws of optics.
> Mind, IX. 414.

halluf (hal′uf), n. [Abyssinian.] Ælian's wart-hog, Phacochœrus æliani. Also called Abyssinian phacochœre, Ethiopian wild boar, and haraja. ★See wart-hog.

hallux (hal′uks), n.; pl. halluces (-ū-sēz). [NL., altered from LL. hallex, or rather allex, the great toe, found earlier in fig. sense, L. allex, 'thumbling,' a term of contempt for a little man.] The innermost of the five digits which normally compose the hind foot of air-breathing vertebrates; in man, the great toe. See cut under foot. It is the correlative of pollex, the corresponding digit of the hand. In ornithology it is the digit of the fewest joints, when there are four digits: in birds with three toes in front and one behind it is the hind one; in birds with four digits, all in front, it is the inner one; in birds with four digits, two behind and two before, it is the inner hind one, except in the trogons, where it is the outer hind one; in nearly all birds with three or two digits it is wanting. See cut under bird[1].

> But the hind toe, or hallux, . . . requires special notice, as it is important in classification. The insertion of this digit varies, from the very bottom of the tarsus (metatarsus) . . . to some distance up the bone.
> Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 128.

hallway (hâl′wā), n. An entrance-hall or a passage between rooms in a dwelling or other building.

halm, haulm[1] (hâm), n. [Early mod. E. also haum, hawme; < ME. halm, < AS. healm, the stem or stalk of grass, grain, etc., straw (cf. healm-streáw, straw, stubble), = OS. halm = D. MLG. halm = OHG. halm, MHG. halm, halme, G. halm = Icel. hālmr, stem, stalk, straw, = Sw. E. culminate, etc.), columen, top, summit, columna, a pillar (> E. column, colonnade, colonel, etc.), from the root of cellere, raise, pp. celsus, high, in comp. excellere, raise, be eminent, > E. excel, q. v.] 1. The stem or stalk of grain of any kind, and of peas, beans, hops, etc.

> A fog . . . of rushes, and flood-wood, and wild-celery haulm, and dead crow's-foot.
> R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, x.

2. Straw; the dry stalks of corn, etc., in general.—3. In England, especially, a kind of grass, Ammophila arenaria, growing on sea-beaches. Also called maram, matweed, and stare. See Ammophila, 1.

halmalille (hal′ma-lil), n. [E. Ind.: prob. from a native name.] A valuable tree, Espera cordifolia, abundant in Ceylon, and also widely dispersed throughout tropical Asia. It is the only species of the genus, and belongs to the family Tiliaceæ, being allied to the linden-tree. The wood is much used in boat-building, as it is believed to resist the attack of marine worms, and also, by a certain oleaginous property, to preserve the iron from corrosion. It is exported from Ceylon to Madras, and used in building the Masula boats adapted to the heavy surf of that coast. Its light wood is there known as Trincomali-wood. It is also used in Ceylon in house-building, etc.

Halmaturidæ (hal-ma-tū'ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Halmaturus + -idæ.] A family of kangaroos, taking name from the genus Halmaturus. See Macropodidæ. Bonaparte, 1831.

halmaturous (hal-ma-tū'rus), a. [< NL. Halmaturus, q. v.] Leaping with the assistance of the tail: an epithet of the kangaroos.

Halmaturus (hal-ma-tū'rus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἅλμα(τ-), a spring, leap (< ἅλλεσθαι, spring, leap), + οὐρά, tail.] A genus of kangaroos, of the family Macropodidæ, comprising the ordinary brush-kangaroos, wallabies, or pademelons, which have a naked muffle. Most of the species of the family belong to this genus, and are of moderate or small size. Such are H. antilopinus, H. bennetti, H. thetidis, and others. The range of the genus includes Tasmania and New Guinea as well as Australia. It was founded by Illiger in 1811.

Brush-kangaroo, or Black Wallaby (Halmaturus ualabatus).

halmote†, n. See hallmote.

halo (hā'lō), n. [In ME. hale; = F. halo = Sp. ★halo, halón = Pg. halão = It. alone, < L. halos, gen. and acc. halo (= Ar. hēlah = Hind. hālah, a halo), < Gr. ἅλως, gen. and acc. ἅλω, Epic ἄλωή, a threshing-floor (on which the oxen trod out a circular path), hence the round disk of the sun or moon, later a halo around them, < ἁλεῖν, grind.] 1. A luminous circle, either white or colored, seen round the sun or moon, and commonly of 22° or of 46° radius, the definite radii depending on the definite angles of ice-crystals. Sometimes one of these only is seen, and sometimes both appear at the same time. Halos are due to the refraction of light as it passes through minute ice-needles in the atmosphere. They are frequently accompanied by supernumerary circles, parhelia or mock suns, paraselenæ or mock moons, and variously arranged white bands, crosses, or arcs. All of these phenomena are the result of the refraction, reflection, and diffraction of light when it falls upon crystals of ice suspended in the atmosphere. Halos and their attendant phenomena are more frequent in winter than in summer, and are more commonly observed in the arctic regions than in warmer climates.

Halos must not be confounded with coronæ — those concentric rings which encircle the sun or moon when seen through a mist or cloud. Halos, as we have seen, are red inside, coronæ are red outside. The size of the coronæ depends on the size of the drops of water in a mist or cloud, being smaller as the drops are larger. They are due to diffraction, and can only be explained by the help of the undulatory theory. Tait, Light, p. 133.

2. A circle of light, as the nimbus surrounding the head of a saint. See nimbus.—3. A brownish circle round the nipple; an areola.—4. [NL.] Pl. halones (hal'ō-nēz). In ornith., certain chiefly concentric rings of color in the yolk of an egg: an optical appearance due to the deposition of the yolk in successive layers or strata.—5. Figuratively, an ideal glow or glory investing an object as viewed through the medium of feeling or sentiment.

The past always comes to us with a halo.
S. Bowles, in Merriam, II. 423.

halo (hā'lō), v. [< halo, n.] I. intrans. To form a halo. [Rare.]

His gray hairs
Curled life-like to the fire
That haloed round his saintly brow.
Southey, Thalaba, ix.

II. trans. To surround with a halo.

The fact that a man is not yet haloed with the light that comes only when, in death or in hoary age, he recalls to us the past, need not debar him from full recognition. Stedman, Vict. Poets, p. 410.

Halobates (ha-lob'a-tēz), n. [NL., < Gr. ἅλς (in comp. ἁλι- and ἁλο-), the sea, + βάτης, one that treads, < βαίνειν, go, walk, tread.] A genus of heteropterous insects, of the family Nepidæ: so called because the species are found on the surface of the sea. These bugs are truly pelagic. They are properly tropical and subtropical, but occur in great numbers on the tracts of sargassum, by which they are carried far north and south. Straggling specimens have been found as far north as North Carolina. Eschscholtz.

Halochloa (ha-lok'lō-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἅλς, the sea, + χλόη, verdure.] A genus of algæ established by Kützing in 1843, the type of his family Halochloæ. It is characterized by fronds articulated at the base and provided with distinct leaves, solitary petioled conceptacles, the angiocarps located in the peripheral portion, and distinct petioled aërocysts crowned with leaflets. It is now reduced to a section of Sargassum.

Halochloæ (ha-lok'lō-ē), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Halochloa.] A family of algæ established by Kützing in 1843, coming under his tribe Angiospermeæ, of the class Isocarpeæ, and having the genus Halochloa as the type. It is now embraced in the Fucaceæ.

Halodroma (ha-lod'rō-mä), n. [NL., equiv. to Halidromus*, < Gr. ἁλίδρομος, running over the sea, < ἅλς, the sea, + δραμεῖν, run.] The typical genus of petrels of the subfamily Halodrominæ. Pelecanoides is a synonym of prior date. Illiger, 1811. Also written Haladroma.

halodrome (hal'ō-drōm), n. A bird of the genus Halodroma. Also written haladrome.

Halodrominæ (ha-lod-rō-mī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Halodroma + -inæ.] An aberrant subfamily of Procellariidæ, having short wings and tail as in diving birds, tridactyl feet, the nasal tubes vertical instead of horizontal, and a rudimentary gular pouch. Halodroma is the typical and only genus. The species are found in southern seas, and resemble auks rather than petrels. The subfamily is also known as the family Pelecanoididæ.

halogen (hal'ō-jen), n. [= F. halogène, < Gr. ἅλς, salt, + -γενης, producing: see -gen.] In chem., an element that forms a compound of a saline nature by its direct union with a metal. The halogens are chlorin, iodine, bromine, and fluorin, to which cyanogen may be added as a compound halogen.

halogenia (hal-ō-jē'ni-ä), n. [NL.: see halogen.] Same as halogen.

halogenous (ha-loj'e-nus), a. [As halogen + -ous.] Having the nature of halogens; generating saline compounds.

halography (ha-log'ra-fi), n. [< Gr. ἅλς, salt, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] A description of salts. Thomas.

haloid (hā'loid), a. and n. [< Gr. ἅλς, salt, + εἶδος, form.] I. a. In chem., like sea-salt: applied to all those compounds which consist of a metal directly united to chlorin, bromine, iodine, or fluorin. They are distinguished by the name of haloid salts because in constitution they are all similar to sea-salt.

There is a class of bodies, the haloid ethers, which stand in nearly the same relation to the corresponding hydrogen compounds as benzoënitrite to hydrocyanic acid.
E. Frankland, Exper. in Chemistry, p. 36.

II. n. A haloid salt.

Also spelled haloide.

halomancy (hal'ō-man-si), n. [< Gr. ἅλς, salt, + μαντεία, divination: see mantis.] Divination in some manner by means of salt. Also written, less properly, alomancy.

halones, n. Plural of halo, 4.

Halonia (ha-lō'ni-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἁλωνία, a threshing-floor, < ἅλως. See halo.] A name given by Lindley and Hutton to a fossil found in the coal-measures, in regard to the nature and affinities of which there has been much discussion. It is now known to be a fruiting ★branch of Lepidophloios (which see).

halophilous (ha-lof'i-lus), a. [< Gr. ἅλς, salt, + φίλος, loving.] In bot., preferring or habitually growing in soil impregnated with salt, or ★various salts, as maritime plants.

halophyte (hal'ō-fīt), n. [< Gr. ἅλς, salt, + φυτόν, a plant.] The saltwort, a plant, such as those of the genera Salicornia, Salsola, and Dondia, inhabiting salt marshes and sea-coasts. The ash contains barilla and other salts.

Haloragaceæ (hal-ō-rā-gā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Haloragis + -aceæ.] An order of plants established by Lindley in 1846, including the Haloragidaceæ as now defined and also the genus Trapa, but excluding the genus Gunnera.

Haloragidaceæ (hal-ō-rā-ji-dā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Haloragis (-id-) + -aceæ.] A family of dicotyledonous archichlamydeous (choripetalous) plants, characterized by small, often incomplete 2- to 4-merous flowers, inferior 1- to 4-celled ovary, with as many distinct styles, solitary pendulous ovules, and fleshy albumen. They consist largely of aquatic herbs, the genera Hippuris, Myriophyllum, and Proserpinaca being represented in North America. The family has been variously called Haloragaceæ, Haloragaceæ, Haloragiaceæ, Haloragideæ, etc., and made by some authors to include the genera Trapa and Callitriche, and Lindley placed the genus Gunnera in the Araliaceæ.

Haloragis (hal-ō-rā'jis), n. [NL., irreg. < Gr. ἅλς, the sea, + ῥάξ, a berry.] The typical genus of the family Haloragidaceæ, founded by J. and G. Forster in 1776, consisting of about 50 species of plants, chiefly Australasian, a few occurring in India and China, and one on the island of Juan Fernandez. The genus is botanically characterized by the possession of 4 petals, 8 stamens, a 1- to 4-celled ovary with from 2 to 4 ovules in each cell, and plumose stigmas. The plants are chiefly low terrestrial herbs with small leaves, and bear inconspicuous axillary flowers which are sometimes unisexual, the pistillate (female) flowers in such cases being generally apetalous. Two Australian species, H. alata and H. tetragyna, are cultivated under the name of seaberry.

halosaurian (hal-ō-sâ'ri-an), n. [As Halosaurus + -ian.] An extinct marine saurian, as an ichthyosaur or a plesiosaur.

The Halosaurians, with their best known genera, Ichthyosaurus and Plesiosaurus, are entirely peculiar to the secondary period. Claus, Zoölogy (trans.), p. 177.

Halosauridæ (hal-ō-sâ'ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Halosaurus + -idæ.] A family of teleocephalous fishes having the body entirely covered by cycloid scales, the margin of the upper jaw formed by the intermaxillaries mesially and by the maxillaries laterally, the opercular apparatus incomplete, the gill-openings wide, and the ovaries closed. They are of an elongated form, with a tapering pointed tail, no caudal fin, no adipose fin, a small short dorsal fin, a very long anal fin, and a scaly head without barbels.

Halosaurus (hal-ō-sâ'rus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἅλς, the sea, + σαῦρος, a lizard.] The typical genus of Halosauridæ. H. macrochir is a deep-sea Atlantic species about 2 feet long. Johnson, 1863.

haloscope (hal'ō-skōp), n. [< Gr. ἅλως, a halo, + σκοπεῖν, view.] An instrument invented by M. Beauvais which exhibits the phenomena connected with halos, parhelia, and the like.

halotrichite (ha-lot'ri-kīt), n. [< Gr. ἅλς, salt, + θρίξ (τριχ-), hair, + *-ite*2.] 1. An iron alum found in silky fibrous aggregations.—2. Same as alunogen.

haloxylin (ha-lok'si-lin), n. [< Gr. ἅλς, salt, + ξύλον, wood, + *-in*2.] A mixture of yellow prussiate of potassa, niter, and charcoal, used as an explosive.

halp†, halpe†. Obsolete preterits of help.

halpace†, n. See hautepace.

halse1† (hâls), n. [Also dial. (Sc.) hawse; < ME. hals, < AS. heals = OS. hals = OFries. hals = D. hals = OHG. MHG. G. hals = Icel. hāls = Sw. > Shak., Rich. III., i. 1.
>
> The traveler now, stooping, felt his foot and leg, as if trying whether they were sound; apparently something ailed them, for he halted to the stile whence I had just risen, and sat down. Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, xii.

2. To stand in doubt; hesitate; linger; delay.

> How long halt ye between two opinions? 1 Ki. xviii. 21.
>
> Their religion halteth betwixt diuers religions of the Turkes, Persians, and Christians of the Iacobite and Nestorian Sects. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 343.
>
> Haue you perceiued my liberalitie or goodnesse, towardes you, to halt, to faynt, or to be slacke, at any tyme, or in any thyng?
> Udall, Flowers for Latin Speaking, fol. 24.

3. To be lame, faulty, or defective, as in connection of ideas, or in measure or versification: as, a halting metaphor; a halting sonnet.

> The lady shall say her mind freely, or the blank verse shall halt for 't. Shak., Hamlet, ii. 2.
>
> Spenser himself affects the obsolete,
> And Sidney's verse halts ill on Roman feet.
> Pope, Imit. of Horace, II. i. 98.

halt[1] (hâlt), n. [< halt[1], v.] 1. The act of limping; lameness; a defect in gait.—2. A disease in sheep.

> In cold stiff soils the bleaters oft complain
> Of gouty ails, by shepherds term'd the halt.
> Dyer, Fleece, i.

halt[2] (hâlt), n. [First in 17th century, also alt (Milton), < OF. halte or halt, stop, stay, = It. alto, stop, stay, in the phrase fare alto = F. faire halte, stop, stay, make a stand; cf. D. halte or halt, houden, lit. hold, halt, < G. halt, halt, lit. hold, impv. of halten = E. hold[1]: see hold[1], v.] A stop; a suspension of progress in walking, riding, or going in any manner, and especially in marching.

> To descry the distant foe,
> Where lodged, or whither fled; or if for fight,
> In motion or in halt. Milton, P. L., vi. 532.
>
> Among them rose a cry
> As if to greet the king; they made a halt.
> Tennyson, Princess, v.

A halt was called at Oxford, with the advance seventeen miles south of there.
U. S. Grant, Personal Memoirs, I. 432.

halt[2] (hâlt), v. [= F. halter, halt; from the noun.] I. intrans. To stop in walking or going; cease to advance; stop for a longer or shorter time on a march, as a body of troops.

> At length prudence and reason cry Halt!
> Tyndall, Forms of Water, p. 54.
>
> When we halted at that other well,
> And I was faint to swooning.
> Tennyson, Merlin and Vivien.

II. trans. To bring to a stand; cause to cease marching: as, the general halted his troops.

halt[3]†. A Middle English contraction of haldeth, equivalent to holdeth, third person singular of the present indicative of hold[1].

halter[1] (hâl'tėr), n. [< ME. halter; < halt[1], v., + -er[1].] One who halts or limps; hence, one who hesitates as in doubt.

> Those halters between two religions think they can do their homage to the true God and to the false.
> D. Stokes, Twelve Minor Prophets (1659), p. 412.

halter[2] (hâl'tėr), n. [< ME. halter, helter, helfter, < AS. hælfter, healfter, hælftre (= MD. halfter, halchter, D. halfter, halster = MLG. halter, LG. halfter, helchter, halter = OHG. halftra, MHG. helfter, G. halfter, a halter), < half-*, a base appearing also, with umlaut, in AS. hielf, helf, E. helve, a handle, and in AS. helma (for orig. helfma*, helbma*), E. helm[1], a handle, tiller (see helve and helm[1]), + suffix -ter.] 1. A rope, cord, or strap having at one end a noose or a headstall, for leading or confining a horse or other animal.

> He took a cowt [colt] halter frae his hose . . .
> And tied it to his gray mare's tale.
> Lochmaben Harper (Child's Ballads, VI. 8).

2. A rope specially intended for hanging malefactors; a hangman's noose.

> Pitie it is that he priseth a halter so deare, else would he rid the world of a burthen, and himselfe of his worthlesse life. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 325.
>
> Thou musty justice,
> Buy an honourable halter, and hang thyself!
> Fletcher and Shirley, Night-Walker, iii. 3.

★ halter[2] (hâl'tėr), v. t. [< halter[2], n.] To put a halter on; catch, hold, or make fast with or as if with a halter: as, to halter a horse.

> I have savage cause;
> And to proclaim it civilly, were like
> A halter'd neck, which does the hangman thank > For being yare about him. Shak., A. and C., iii. 11.
>
> What pretty gins thou hast to halter woodcocks!
> Fletcher, Wit without Money, iv. 2.

halter[3] (hal'tėr), n.; pl. halteres (hal-tē'rēz). [< L. halter, < Gr. ἁλτήρ, usually in pl. ἁλτῆρες, weights held in the hands to give an impetus in leaping, leaping-weights, < ἅλλεσθαι, leap, = L. salire, leap: see salient.] In entom., one of the poisers or balancers of insects: usually in the plural.

Portion of an Asilid Fly, showing a, a, Halteres.

Flies may be easily recognized by their having but a single pair of wings, the hinder pair being aborted, and existing in a rudimentary state under the name of halter.
A. S. Packard, Study of Insects, p. 358.

Halterata†(hal-tē-rā'tä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of halteratus: see halterate.] The order of insects now called Diptera. Scopoli, 1763.

halterate (hal'tē-rāt), a. [< NL. halteratus, < L. halter, a halter: see halter[3].] Having halteres, as a dipterous insect; specifically, pertaining to the Halterata.

halter-break (hâl'tėr-brāk), v. t. To accustom to the use of a halter; break or train by means of a halter, as a colt.

> Always halterbreak colts to go beside their mothers.
> New York Semi-weekly Tribune, Dec. 24, 1886.

halteres, n. Plural of halter[3].

Halteria (hal-tē'ri-ä), n. [NL., < L. halter, < Gr. ἁλτήρ, a leaping-weight: see halter[3].] The typical genus of Halteriidæ, having the peristome spirally involute, the mouth eccentric, and a girdle of supplementary springing-hairs. They are very minute, but may be recognized by their globose form and slow rocking or lagging motions, interrupted at times by quick skipping. They are found only in fresh water. H. grandinella is an example.

Halteriidæ (hal-tē-rī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Halteria + -idæ.] A family of free-swimming animalcules, typified by the genus Halteria.

Halterina (hal-tē-rī'nä), n. pl. [NL., < Halteria + -ina[2].] A family of ciliate infusorians, represented by the genera Halteria and Strombidium. Claparède and Lachmann, 1858–60.

Halteriptera†(hal-tē-rip'te-rä), n. pl. [NL., < L. halter, Gr. ἁλτήρ, a leaping-weight, + πτερόν, wing.] The order of insects now called Diptera. Clairville, 1798.

halteripterous†, a. [See Halteriptera.] Having halteres, as a dipterous insect; specifically, pertaining to the Halteriptera.

halterman†(hâl'tėr-man), n. A hangman.

> It is an ill wind that blows no man to good, for haltermen and ballet-makers were not better set a-worke this many a day. Lundle of New Wit (1638).

haltersack†(hâl'tėr-sak), n. One who is fit for the gallows; a hangdog; a gallows-bird.

> A knavish lad, a slie wag, a haltersack. Florio, p. 81.
>
> I would hang him up by the heels, and flay him, and salt him, whoreson halter-sack.
> Beau. and Fl., Knight of Burning Pestle, i. 4.

Haltica (hal'ti-kä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἁλτικός, leaping, < ἅλλεσθαι, leap: see halter[3].] A genus of flea-beetles, referred to the Chrysomelidæ or Galerucidæ, or made type of a family Halticidæ. The turnip-flea or turnip-fly, H. nemorum, destructive at times to turnip-crops, is an example. Another species, H. consobrina, attacks cabbage. The cucumber flea-beetle, H. cucumeris, is one of the commonest in the United States. Also written Altica. See also cut under flea-beetle.

Cucumber Flea-beetle (Haltica cucumeris). (Line shows natural size.)

Halticidæ (hal-tis'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Haltica + -idæ.] A family of saltatorial coleopters or jumping beetles, typified by the genus Haltica; the flea-beetles. They have thickened hind femora, fitted for leaping, are of small size and often bright-colored, and are especially injurious to cruciferous plants. Also written Halticides, Halticites.

Halticoptera[1] (hal-ti-kop'te-rä), n. [NL., fem. sing., < Gr. ἁλτικός, leaping, + πτερόν, wing.] A genus of chalcid hymenopters, of the subfamily Pteromalinæ, of which the European H. aterrima is the sole species. Spinola, 1811.

Halticoptera[2] (hal-ti-kop'te-rä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl.: see Halticoptera[1].] A series of genera in Chalcididæ proposed by Haliday in 1840. [Not in use.]

Halticoridæ (hal-ti-kor'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Halticoris + -idæ.] A family of jumping bugs, or saltatorial heteropterous insects, typified by the genus Halticoris, and belonging to the superfamily Capsina. Douglas and Scott, 1865.

Halticoris (hal-tik'ō-ris), n. [NL. (Douglas and Scott, 1865), contr. of Halticocoris*, < Gr. ἁλτικός, leaping (see Haltica), + κόρις, bug.] A genus of true bugs, typical of the family Halticoridæ, comprising a few European species, as H. pallicornis.

haltingly (hâl'ting-li), adv. In a halting manner; with limping; hesitatingly; slowly.

halvaner, halvanner (hal'van-ėr), n. [North. E., < halvan-s + -er[1].] A miner who dresses or washes halvan-ore. See halvans.

halvan-ore (hal'van-ōr), n. See halvans.

halvans (hal'vanz), n. pl. [North. E., perhaps for halfens* (cf. halfendeal), < half, q. v.] In mining, the refuse ore, or that from which the best part has been selected. Halvans may be subjected to further culling; and, when this is done, the ore thus obtained is called halvan-ore. In general, the word is a synonym of attle[1]. [Not much used in the United States.]

halve (häv), v. t.; pret. and pp. halved, ppr. halving. [< ME. halven, halfen (= MHG. halben, helben, G. halben); < half, a.] 1. To divide into two parts, especially two equal parts or halves.

> But halve your men in equal parts.
> Battle of Philiphaugh (Child's Ballads, VII. 134).

We can no more halve things, and get the sensual good by itself, than we can get an inside that shall have no outside, or a light without a shadow.
Emerson, Compensation.

2. To join, as two pieces of timber, by cutting away one half or an equal portion in depth of each, so as to let them into each other. This is done to produce either a lap-joint, a dovetail, a scarf, or a notched joint or common halving. The upper figure represents the simple lap-joint, and the lower one the common halving.

Halving.

halvet, a. and n. An obsolete variant of half. ★Chaucer.

halved (hävd), a. In bot., with one half, or nearly so, of a nominally bilateral organ wanting, as in the leaves of some begonias; dimidiate.

halve-net, haave-net (hâv'net), n. [< Icel. háfr, a kind of net for herring-fishing, + E. net[1], n.] A standing net placed within water-mark to prevent the fishes from returning with the tide. [Scotch.] halves (hävz), n. Plural of half.

halving-belt (hä'ving-belt), n. A belt crossed between two pulleys to make them revolve in opposite directions.

halwet, n. and v. A Middle English form of hallow[1].

haly (hā'li), a. An obsolete (Middle English) ★or dialectal (Scotch) form of holy.

halyard, halliard (hal'yärd), n. [Also written haliard, haulyard; commonly regarded as < hale[1] + yard[1], "because they hale or draw the yards into their places" (Skeat), but more probably a perversion, accommodated to this notion (or to lanyard, laniard, q. v.), of an earlier hallier or halier*, equiv. to haler or hauler, < hale[1] + -ier[1]. Hallier does occur in other senses: see hallier[2].] Naut., a rope or purchase used to hoist or lower yards or sails on their respective masts or stays. All yards have halyards except the lower yards and lower topsail-yards.

Each mast has only two shrouds of twisted rattan, which are often both shifted to the weather-side; and the halyard, when the yard is up, serves instead of a third shroud. Anson, Voyages, ii. 10.

Crowfoot-halyards, lines running through a block on a stay, used for tightening the backbone of an awning.—Peak-halyards, the ropes or tackles by which the outer end of a gaff is hoisted.—Signal-halyards, light lines running through sheaves at the gaff-ends or mastheads, used for hoisting flags.

My attention was now directed by one of the men to the "Waldershare," who was trying to signal us by means of a lantern made fast to the peak signal halyards and run up and down. W. C. Russell, Sailor's Sweetheart, iii.

Throat-halyard, the rope or purchase by which the end of a gaff nearest the mast is hoisted.

halyard-rack (hal'yärd-rak, n. Naut., a wooden framework in which the running part of any halyard is kept coiled, so that it may always be clear for running.

Halymeda, Halymedidæ. See Halimeda, Halimedidæ.

Halymenia (hal-i-mē'ni-ä), n. [NL. (Agardh, 1842), appar. irreg. < Gr. ἅλς, the sea, + μήν, month, or moon.] A genus of marine algæ belonging to the natural order Cryptonemiales, family Grateloupiaceæ, characterized by the cylindraceous or compressed, gelatinous, membranaceous fronds, which are dichotomous, pinnate, or variously branched, and by the simple cortical layer formed of small oblong cells, its medullary portion being formed of large cells and internal articulated branching filaments. Natives of the warmer seas.

Halymenieæ (hal'i-mē-nī'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Halymenia + -eæ.] One of the families of algæ established by Kützing, now included in the family Grateloupiaceæ.

Halymenites (hal-i-mē-nī'tēz), n. [NL., < Halymenia + -ites.] A genus of fossil algæ, so named by Sternberg in 1833 from its supposed affinity with Halymenia. As emended by Schimper in 1869, it embraces forms with coriaceous or membranaceous, flattened or terete and fistulous fronds, and tubercled or punctiform sporangia immersed in the lamina of the frond. These forms are found in the Cretaceous and Tertiary formations of Europe and America, being specially abundant in the passage-beds between these two systems of rocks. H. major is a large branching species with cylindrical, hollow warty fronds, very abundant in the Upper Cretaceous of the Rocky Mountain region, and called by the settlers petrified corn-cobs.

halymotet, n. Same as hallmote.

Halysereæ (hal-i-sē'rē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Halyseris + -eæ.] In Lindley's system of classification of plants, a suborder of the Fucaceæ, having the fronds polysiphonous, barked, jointed, or continuous, and the vesicles scattered over the surface of the frond or collected into heaps. It embraced the tribes Sphacelaridæ, Laminaridæ, and Sporochnidæ.

Halysereideæ (hal'i-sē-rid'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Halyseris (-rid-) + -eæ.] Endlicher's name (1843) for the Halysereæ.

Halyseris (ha-lis'ē-ris), n. [NL., appar. irreg. < Gr. ἅλς, the sea, + σέρις, endive, chicory.] An inadmissible emendation of Haliseris, a genus of brown marine algæ, named by Targioni in 1817, belonging to the class Dictyotales. The frond is flat, dichotomous, and membranaceous, with a median nerve. The spores are naked, and united insori longitudinally arranged along each side of the costa. About a dozen species are known, inhabiting the warmer seas. A fossil form has been found in the Oölite of Yorkshire, which has been referred to this genus (H. erecta).

Halyserites (hal'i-sē-rī'tēz), n. [NL., < Halyseris + -ites.] An inadmissible emendation of Haliserites, the generic name given by Sternberg in 1833 to a fossil plant from the Middle Cretaceous (Cenomanian) of Niederschönau in Saxony, regarded by him as an alga allied to Haliserites. The forms from the Oölite and Carboniferous referred to this genus appear to have no affinity with it. See Haliserites in the supplement.

Halysidota (hal'i-si-dō'tä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἁλυσιδωτός, wrought in chain fashion, < ἅλυσις, a chain.] A genus of American arctiid moths. H. caryæ is the common hickory tussock-moth of North America. Originally Halesidota. Hübner, 1816.

Halysites (hal-i-sī'tēz), n. [NL. (Fischer), < Gr. ἅλυσις, a chain.] The typical genus of chain-corals of the family Halysitidæ: same as Catenipora.

Halysitidæ (hal-i-sit'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Halysites + -idæ.] A family of paleozoic tabulate corals, taking name from the genus Halysites; the chain-corals.

Halysitinæ (hal'i-si-tī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Halysites + -inæ.] A subfamily of chain-corals, referred to Favositidæ. Edwards and Haime, 1849.

Halytherium, n. See Halitherium.

ham[1] (ham), n. [< ME. hamme, homme, < AS. ★hamm = D. ham = MLG. ham, hamme = OHG. hamma, MHG. hamme, G. dial. hamme, the ham, = Icel. höm, the ham or haunch of a horse, = Sw. dial. ham, the hind part of the knee; prob. lit. the 'crook' or 'bend' of the leg (cf. OF. F. jambe = Sp. Pg. It. gamba, ML. gamba, leg (see gamb, jamb), ult. of Celtic origin); cf. W. Ir. Gael. cam, crooked, L. camur, crooked; L. camera, camara, < Gr. καμάρα, a vault, chamber, etc.: see cam[2], camera, camber[1], chamber, etc.] 1. The back of the thigh; the thigh as a whole; in the plural, the gluteal region, the buttocks.

They [old men] have a plentiful lack of wit, together with most weak hams. Shak., Hamlet, ii. 2.

Hark ye, pupil;
Go as I taught you, hang more upon your hams,
And put your knees out bent.
Fletcher (and another), Queen of Corinth, ii. 4.

At the caia's those who attended the consul kneeled on the sopha, resting behind on their hams, which is a very humble posture.
Pococke, Description of the East, II. i. 102.

2. In anat., specifically, the back of the knee; the lozenge-shaped area behind the knee, bounded by the hamstrings and heads of the calf-muscles, technically called the popliteal space.—3. The thigh of an animal slaughtered for food; particularly, the thigh of a hog salted and cured or dried in smoke.

Thy truffles, Perigord! thy hams, Bayonne!
Pope, Dunciad, iv. 558.

ham[2] (ham), n. 1†. An obsolete (Middle English and Anglo-Saxon) form of home[1].—2. In historical use, with reference to the Anglo-Saxon period, a village or town; more specifically, a manor or private estate with a community of serfs upon it: much used in compound local names, as in Birmingham, Nottingham.

Their homes, indeed, must have been scantily sprinkled over the wild and half-reclaimed country; but scant as they were, these "hams" and "tons" told as plainly as in other districts the tale of English colonization.
J. R. Green, Making of Eng., p. 70.

ham[3] (ham), n. [< ME. ham, hamme (in comp. names), < AS. ham (hamm-), an inclosure, fold, dwelling, chiefly in comp., in local names, in which it became confused with ham[2], similarly used (see ham[2], 2). Cf. hem[1], hemble.] A stinted common pasture for cows. Grose. [Prov. Eng.]

hama (hā'mä), n. Same as ama.

Hamacantha (ham-a-kan'thä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἅμα, together, + ἄκανθα, thorn.] The typical genus of Hamacanthinæ. J. E. Gray.

Hamacanthinæ (ham'a-kan-thī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Hamacantha + -inæ.] A subfamily of Heterorhaphidæ, typified by the genus Hamacantha, having megascleres as oxea or styli, and microscleres as diancistræ.

hamadryad (ham'a-drī-ad), n.; pl. hamadryads, hamadryades (-ädz, ham-a-drī'a-dēz). [< L. hamadryas, pl. hamadryades, < Gr. ἁμαδρυάς, pl. ἁμαδρυάδες (also ἁδρυάς, pl. ἁδρυάδες), < ἅμα, together with (= E. same, q. v.) (or ἀ- copulative), + δρῦς, a tree, esp. the oak-tree, = E. tree: see dryad.] 1. In Gr. myth., a wood-nymph believed to live and die with the tree to which she was attached.

They were called Dryades and Hamadryades, because they begin to live with oakes, and perish together.
Sandys, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., viii., notes.

The common opinion concerning the nymphs whom the ancients called hamadryads is more to the honour of trees than anything yet mentioned. It was thought that the fate of these nymphs had so near a dependence on some trees, more especially oaks, that they lived and died together. Spectator, No. 589.

I am not sure that the tree was a gainer when the hamadryad flitted and left it nothing but ship-timber.
Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 166.

2. In entom.: (a) A dryad or wood-nymph, a butterfly of the old genus Hamadryas. (b) pl. A group of lepidopterous insects.—3. In herpet., a large, hooded, venomous Indian serpent, Naja hamadryas or Hamadryas elaps, now Ophiophagus elaps. It is related to the cobra.—4. In mammal., a large Abyssinian baboon, Cynocephalus hamadryas, with long mane and whiskers and tufted tail. Also called hebe.

Hamadryas (ha-mad'ri-as), n. [NL.: see hamadryad.] 1. A genus of lepidopterous insects. Hübner, 1816.—2. A genus of venomous serpents, of the family Elapidæ. See Ophiophagus. J. E. Gray, 1840.—3. A genus of mollusks.—4. [l. c.] The specific name of a baboon, Cynocephalus hamadryas.

hamal (ha-mäl'), n. [Turk. hammāl, < Ar. hammāl, a porter, carrier, < hamala, carry, bear.] A porter; in western India, a bungalow servant. Two hamals carry immense weights between them, suspended from poles supported on their shoulders.

Hamamelaceæ (ham'a-mē-lā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hamamelis + -aceæ.] See Hamamelidæ.

Hamameleæ (ham-a-mē'lē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hamamelis + -eæ.] In the classification of de Candolle, Gray, and others, a tribe or subfamily of plants, of the family Hamamelidaceæ, embracing the genera Hamamelis, Fothergilla, etc., and distinguished from the Balsamifluæ, to which Liquidambar belongs, by their one-ovuled cells and more apparent floral envelops.

Hamamelidaceæ (ham-a-mē-li-dā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hamamelis (-lid-) + -aceæ. Lindley, 1847.] A family of dicotyledonous archichlamydeous trees or shrubs, chiefly characterized by the inferior or half-inferior ovary and the solitary ovule pendent from the apex of the cell, embracing about 50 species belonging to 19 genera, of which Hamamelis (the witch-hazel) and Liquidambar (the sweet-gum) are the most important.

Hamamelideæ (ham'a-mē-lid'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hamamelis (-lid-) + -eæ.] The name given by Robert Brown in 1818 to the plant family Hamamelidaceæ (which see). Lindley in 1836 used the name Hamamelaceæ for the same family. Both names have been used by more modern authors.

Hamamelis (ham-a-mē'lis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἁμαμηλίς, a tree with fruit like the pear, a kind of medlar or service-tree, < ἅμα, together with, + μῆλον, apple or other tree-fruit.] The typical genus of the family Hamamelidaceæ, founded by Linnæus in 1753, embracing 3 species of shrubs or small trees, and distinguished from related genera by the 4-parted flowers, deeply lobed calyx, blunt anthers, and deciduous leaves. H. Virginiana is the witch-hazel of North America; the others are natives of Japan. The flowers are polygamous, the staminate (male) ones having elongated, linear petals, which expand in autumn after the leaves have fallen. The leaves are large, crenate, and unequal at the base. The fruit is a dry, woody capsule.

hamarthritis (ham-är-thrī'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἁμαρθρῖτις, gout in all the joints at once, < ἅμα, together, + ἀρθρῖτις, gout: see arthritis.] In pathol., arthritis, or more specifically gout, in all the joints.

hamartialogy (ha-mär-ti-al'ō-ji), n. [< Gr. ἁμαρτία, error, sin, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] 1. That part of theology which treats of the origin, nature, operations, and effects of sin; the doctrine of sin: a subdivision of anthropology.—2. A treatise or dissertation on sin.

hamartite (ham'är-tīt), n. See fluocerite.

hamate (hā′māt), a. [< L. hamatus, furnished with a hook, hooked, < hamus, a hook.] 1. Hooked; entangled. [Rare.]

To explain cohesion by hamate atoms is accounted ignotum per ignotius. Berkeley, Siris, § 227.

2. In zoöl., hooked; uncinate: same as hamulate. [Rare.]—3. In bot., curved like a hook; hooked at the tip: said of hairs, spines, etc.

hamated (hā′mā-ted), a. Hooked, or set with hooks. [Rare.]

Nothing less than a violent heat can disentangle these creatures from their hamated station of life. Swift, Mechanical Operations of the Spirit.

ham-beetle (ham′bē″tl), n. A beetle, Corynetes (or Necrobia) rufipes, the larva of which often does great damage to cured hams in the United States. More fully called red-legged ham-beetle.

Red-legged Ham-beetle (Corynetes rufipes).

a, larva (line shows natural size); b, pupa (line shows natural size); c, cocoon; d, beetle, enlarged; e, beetle, natural size; f, leg of larva; g, mandible; h, labium; i, maxilla; j, antenna of larva. (f, g, h, i, j, enlarged.)

Two other beetles, the bacon-beetle, Silpha americana, and the larder-beetle, Dermestes lardarius, also occasionally injure hams, and the name may be also applied to them. But both the latter chiefly affect tainted or spoiled hams, while the true ham-beetle attacks well-cured hams. See also cut under bacon-beetle.

hamble (ham′bl), v.; pret. and pp. hambled, ppr. hambling. [Also dial. hammel, hamel; < ME. hamelen, mutilate, < AS. hamelian (only once), mutilate (= OFries. homelia (also in verbal n. homelenga, hamelinga, hemelenga, hemilinge, mutilation, as of the beard) = OHG. hamalōn, MHG. hameln, mutilate, maim, G. hammeln, hämmeln, geld (lambs), = Icel. hamla = ODan. hamle, mutilate, maim), < hamol* (found in only one passage, in def. form as noun, homola, homela, used to designate a person with his head shaved (as a mark of disgrace); cf. Hambletonian (ham-bl-tō′ni-an), n. [From Black Hambleton, a race-course in Yorkshire, England.] The name of a breed of American trotting-horses descended from Hambletonian (foaled in 1849), and more remotely from Messenger, an English thoroughbred.

hambroline (ham′brō-lin), n. Naut., a sort of small line used for seizings.

Hamburg (ham′bėrg), n. 1. An excellent black variety of the Vitis vinifera or European grape, indigenous in Tyrol, where it is called Trollinger or Tirolinger, and perhaps the favorite grape throughout the world for hothouse cultivation. The berries are oblong, and of a peculiarly delicate and refreshing flavor. Commonly called black Hamburg. The muscat Hamburg is a variety differing but little from the other.

2. A variety of the domestic hen, of small size, with rose comb and blue legs, and the plumage of the male in general similar to that of the female. There are black Hamburgs, and gold- and silver-(yellow- and white-) spangled and penciled Hamburgs, the spangling or penciling being black on a yellow or white ground. They are among the prettiest of fowls, and are exceedingly prolific layers, though the eggs are small. The Hamburghs, erroneously so called from a name given them in the classification adopted at the early Birmingham shows, are chiefly breeds of English origin. Encyc. Brit., XIX. 645.

hamelet†, n. See hamlet[1].

Hamelia (ha-mē′li-ä), n. [NL., named after the French botanist Du Hamel (Duhamel-Dumonceau, 1700–82).] A genus of tropical or subtropical American shrubs, founded by Jacquin in 1760, belonging to the family Rubiaceæ, and type of the tribe Hamelieæ, having a 5-lobed calyx, 5-ribbed corolla with stamens inserted at the base of its tube, a fusiform stigma, and the flowers arranged in scorpioid cymes. The genus embraces 6 species, several of which, especially H. patens, have handsome flowers, and are in cultivation as stove-plants. H. ventricosa, a native of Jamaica, is there called princewood and Spanish elm.

Hameliaceæ (ha-mē-li-ā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. Richard, 1834), < Hamelia + -aceæ.] A group of genera of rubiaceous plants, of which Hamelia is the type, equal to the tribe Hamelieæ of de Candolle.

Hamelidæ (ha-mel′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hamelia + -idæ.] In Lindley's system, a suborder of Cinchonaceæ, having the genus Hamelia as the type, and substantially the same as the tribe Hamelieæ of de Candolle.

Hamelieæ (ham-ē-lī′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Hamelia + -eæ.] A tribe of plants, of the family Rubiaceæ, established in 1830 by A. P. de Candolle, who included in it 13 genera, of which Hamelia is the type. It was restricted by Bentham and Hooker to 6 genera, and in Engler's system it is reduced to a subtribe of the Gardenieæ with only 5 genera. It is differently constituted in each of the systems and Hamelia is almost the only genus common to them all.

hamely (hām′li), a. A Scotch form of homely.

hamer†, n. An obsolete form of hammer[1].

hamesucken (hām′suk-n), n. [Sc., < AS. hāmsōcn, an attack on a man's house, also the fine therefor (= Icel. heimsökn; cf. Also homesocken.

hamfatter (ham′fat″ėr), n. A term of contempt for an actor of a low grade, as a negro minstrel. Said to be derived from an old-style negro song called "The Ham-fat Man."

hami, n. Plural of hamus, 1.

hamiform (ham′i-fôrm), a. [< L. hamus, a hook, + forma, shape.] Hamate or hamulate in form; unciform; uncinate.

Hamiglossa (ham-i-glos′ä), n. pl. [NL., < L. hamus, a hook, + Gr. γλῶσσα, tongue.] A group of proboscis-bearing gastropods with the radular teeth in three longitudinal rows, of which the central row is fixed, while the lateral rows are changeable. It includes such families as the Muricidæ and Buccinidæ, or the whelks and the like.

hamiglossate (ham-i-glos′āt), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Hamiglossa.

Hamilton group. See group[1].

Hamiltonia (ham-il-tō′ni-ä), n. [NL., named after F. Buchanan (1762–1829), who took in his later years the name of Hamilton, author of various works, some relating to India.] An untenable name for Spermadictyon, a genus of shrubs, founded by Roxburgh in 1819, of the family Rubiaceæ, distinguished by the 5-celled ovary, 5-parted style, and reticulate seed-coat, and embracing 3 or 4 species, natives of India, China, and the Indian archipelago. They have showy flowers with long tubular corollas, arranged in terminal panicles. One of the species, Spermadictyon suaveolens, has fragrant white flowers, and is well known to florists.

Hamiltonian (ham-il-tō′ni-an), a. and n. I. a. 1. Pertaining to James Hamilton (1769–1831), and especially to a system of teaching languages which he advocated, and which was based upon the two principles that language is to be presented to the scholar as a living organism, and that its laws are to be learned by observation and not by rules.—2. Pertaining to Sir William Hamilton (1788–1856), an influential philosopher and logician of the Scottish school.

The general principle of the Hamiltonian logic. R. Adamson, Encyc. Brit., XIV. 799.

3. Pertaining to Sir William Rowan Hamilton (1805–65), an Irish mathematician.—4. Pertaining to or holding the political doctrines of Alexander Hamilton (1757–1804), an American statesman, who was one of the leaders of the Federalist party and the first Secretary of the Treasury.

Laying entirely aside the general proposition that the Hamiltonian Federalists considered a national debt as in itself a desirable institution, and conceding that the Federalists would themselves have ultimately reduced or discharged it, there still remains the fact that the Federalists made the debt a subordinate, Mr. Gallatin made it a paramount, consideration in politics. H. Adams, Gallatin, p. 174.

Hamiltonian equation. See equation.—Hamiltonian functions. See function.—Hamiltonian operator. See operator.

II. n. A follower of any one of the persons named above. See I.

Hamiltonism (ham′il-ton-izm), n. [< Hamilton (see def.) + -ism.] The philosophy of Sir William Hamilton.

This is Kantism, but it is not Hamiltonism. J. S. Mill, Examination of Hamilton, iii.

hamirostrate (ham-i-ros′trāt), a. [< L. hamus, a hook, + rostrum, a beak.] Having a hooked beak; uncirostrate.

Hamite[1] (ham′īt), n. [< Ham (see def.) + -ite[2].] 1. A descendant of Ham, one of the sons of Noah according to the account in Genesis; a member of one of the races supposed to have been derived from the four sons of Ham (Gen. x.); specifically, one of a race speaking a so-called Hamitic language. See Hamitic.—2. Popularly, an African; a negro.

Whilst the Caucasian doubts the humanity of the Hamite, the latter repays the compliment in kind. H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 207.

hamite[2] (hā′mīt), n. [< L. hamus, a hook, + -ite[2].] A fossil cephalopod of the genus Hamites.

Hamites (ha-mī′tēz), n. [NL. (Parkinson, 1811), < L. hamus, a hook, + -ites.] A genus of fossil cephalopods, related to Ammonites, having the shell hooked or bent upon itself in separate courses, not in spiral whorls. There are numerous species, chiefly from the Chalk.

Hamitic (ha-mit′ik), a. [< Hamite[1] + -ic.] Of or pertaining to Ham, one of the sons of Noah (Gen. x.), or to any of the races considered to be his descendants. The Hamitic tongues are a class of African languages, comprising the ancient Egyptian of the hieroglyphs and the later Egyptian or Coptic, and the non-Semitic languages of Abyssinia and the regions further south, including the Galla, and also the Libyan or Berber. They are believed by many philologists to have more or less distant affinities with the Semitic family.

Hamitidæ (ha-mit′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Hamites + -idæ.] A family of fossil cephalopods, typified by the genus Hamites, belonging to the Ammonoidea.

hamlet[1] (ham′let), n. [< ME. hamlet, hamelet, a hamlet, < OF. AF. hamlet, hamelet, m. (also hamlette, f.), dim., with -et, of OF. hamel, F. hameau (ML. hamellum), a village, dim., with -el, of ham*, < OFries. hām, North Fries. hamm, a home, dwelling, AS. hām, E. home, village: see home[1] and ham[2].] A small village; a little cluster of houses in the country; especially, in England, a village without a church, which therefore for its ecclesiastical service belongs to the parish represented by another village. Compare parish. The word has no technical use in the United States, except as the legal designation of a few villages in Michigan and Ohio.

Sometimes with secure delight
The upland hamlets will invite.
Milton, L'Allegro, l. 92.

Each in his narrow cell forever laid,
The rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep.
Gray, Elegy.

To several of these towns there are small appendages belonging called hamlets, which are taken notice of in the statute of Exeter. Blackstone, Com., Int., § 4.

★=Syn. See town.

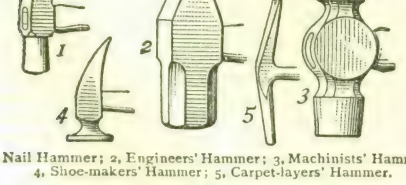
hamlet[2] (ham'let), n. [Origin not ascertained.] A fish of the family Serranidæ, Epinephelus striatus, also called Nassau grouper, common in the West Indies and along the Florida coast. It is chestnut-brown or slate-colored, with vermilion lips and throat.

hamleted† (ham'let-ed), a. [< hamlet[1] + -ed[2].] Established in or accustomed to a hamlet or a country life. [Rare.]

He is properly and pitiedly to be counted alone that is illiterate, and unactively lives hamleted in some untravelled village of the duller country.
Feltham, Resolves, ii. 49.

hammam, hummum (ham'am, hum'um), n. [< Ar. ḥammām, a hot bath, < ḥammim, heat water for a bath.] An establishment for bathing in the Oriental manner with sweating and manipulation; a Turkish or other Oriental bath.

I . . . got a late hackney chariot and drove to the Hummums in Covent Garden.
Dickens, Great Expectations, xlv.



Sometimes . . . we induce him to accompany us to the Hammam, where he [Shaykh Mohammed] insists upon paying the smallest sum, quarrelling with everything and everybody. R. F. Burton, El-Medinah, p. 70.

hammel, hammle (ham'l), v. i. Dialectal forms ★of hamble.

hammer[1] (ham'ėr), n. [< ME. hamer, homer, < AS. hamor, hamer, homer = OS. hamur = OFries. homer, hamer = D. hamer = MLG. hamer = OHG. hamar, MHG. hamer, G. hammer = Icel. hamarr = Sw. hammare = Dan. hammer, a hammer. The Icel. hamarr means also a crag, rock, suggesting a connection with OBulg. kameni, Russ. kamene, a stone, these and the Teut. forms having (in this view) suffered a transposition of the first two consonants: cf. Lith. akmŭ (akmen-) = Lett. akmins, a stone, = Gr. ἄκμων, an anvil, thunderbolt, = Skt. açman, a stone, thunderbolt. The first hammers were of stone.] 1. An instrument consisting of a solid head, usually of metal, but sometimes of wood or of stone, set crosswise to the handle, used for beating metals, driving nails or spikes, dressing or breaking stones, etc.; hence, a machine in which a heavy block of metal is used for such a purpose. See steam-hammer, tilt-hammer, trip-hammer. The head of the hammer is made in various forms, according to the use to which it is to be put. Hammers of stone are found among the remains of antiquity, and are still in use among barbarous races. The hammer has also been used as a weapon of attack in war. See martel-de-fer.

The hamyr bothe stern and grete,
That droffe the naylys throw hand and fote,
Lord, be myn socowr in alle myn lyffe.
Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 185.

Is not my word like as a fire? saith the Lord; and like a hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces? Jer. xxiii. 29.

Gold itself will be sometimes so eager (as artists call it) that it will as little endure the hammer as glass itself.
Locke, Human Understanding, iii. 6.

2. Something which resembles the common hammer in form, action, or use. (a) The piece in a clock which strikes upon the bell to indicate the hour; the striker. (b) In a bell, an independent wooden or metallic lever by which it is sounded: distinguished from a tongue, which is attached to the bell, and is usually operated by swinging the bell itself, though a tongue is sometimes used as a hammer. (c) A small wooden mallet with a padded end or knob, held in the hand, with which the strings of the dulcimer and other similar instruments are struck. (d) In the pianoforte, that part of the mechanism or "action" that is thrown against the strings by the key or digital. It consists of a shank, elastic wooden shank, and a wooden head thickly covered with felt. Each key has its own hammer, which strikes against the one, two, three, or four strings belonging to that particular key. (e) That part of the lock of a firearm which falls with a sharp blow and causes the discharge of the piece. In the flint-lock the piece of flint was secured in the front of the hammer and struck sharply against the steel covering of the pan, displacing it and throwing sparks into the priming in the pan. In the percussion-lock the blow of the hammer explodes the percussion-cap. Ordinarily the hammer can be fixed at half-cock, at which point the pull of the trigger does not move it, and at full-cock, when the movement of the trigger will release it. The form of the hammer and the mode of its action in exploding the charge differ greatly in different kinds of guns. See rebounding lock (under lock[1]), and cut under gun. (f) A gavel used by auctioneers. See to bring to the hammer, below.

Oft as the price-deciding hammer falls,
He notes it in his book. Cowper, Task, vi. 291.

(g) A door-knocker. [Rare.]

Then nightly Knockings at your Door will cease, Whose noiseless Hammer, then, may rust in Peace.
Congreve, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love.

(h) In anat., the malleus. (i) The head of a sphyrnid or hammer-headed shark.

The eyes on the sides of the "hammer"; mouth crescent-shaped, under the "hammer."
Jordan and Gilbert, Bull. U. S. Nat. Mus., No. 16, [1883, p. 25.

3. Figuratively, an aggressive and destructive foe: as, a hammer of heretics (Latin malleus hæreticorum).

Atmospheric hammer. See atmospheric.—Cat's-head hammer. Same as bully-head.—Ceremonial hammer, in archæol., a small stone object resembling the head of a hammer or hatchet, one- or two-edged, and drilled with a fine hole, apparently intended to be hung about the person as an amulet. It is especially common in North America, but amber beads resembling it in form are found in northern Europe. Compare ceremonial hatchet, under hatchet.—Dead-stroke hammer. See drop-press.—Dental hammer or plugger, an apparatus used in filling teeth with gold, consisting of a plugging instrument fitted to a loose sleeve carrying a spring and a tapping device. When the instrument is pressed against the filling of the teeth, the sleeve or tool-stock moves back till a detent is passed, when the sleeve is released and under the influence of a spring strikes a blow upon the plugger. Also called automatic mallet.—Double hammer, a forging device for operating upon a bloom or puddlers' ball, striking it on opposite sides simultaneously. Farrow.—Electric hammer, an electrical apparatus for working a rock-drill. It is constructed on the principle of the dental hammer.—Enlarging-hammer, the hammer used by a gold-beater. It weighs 14 or 15 pounds, and is shaped like a truncated hexagonal pyramid, with a slightly convex face.—Fairy hammer. See fairy.—Hammer and tongs, with great noise, vigor, or violence; violently; vigorously. [Colloq.]

Mr. Malone . . . dashed out of a doorway close by, and before they had time to form line of battle, fell upon them hammer and tongs. H. Kingsley, Ravenshoe, lx.

Horseman's hammer. Same as martel-de-fer.—Lucerne hammer, a name given to the war-hammer or martel d'armes when fitted with a long handle for the use of foot-soldiers: so called because a favorite weapon with Swiss mercenaries from Lucerne.—Millstone hammer. Same as mill-pick.—Nasmyth hammer, a steam-hammer used in forging large masses of metal, especially iron, and having its head attached to the piston-rod of the steam-engine by which it is worked.—Patent hammer, in stone-dressing, a hammer having knife-like ridges on its face, numbering 6, 8, or 10 to the inch.—Thor's hammer. (a) In Norse myth., the hammer of the god Thor, by the wielding or throwing of which thunder and lightning were supposed to be caused. (b) Same as fylfot. (c) A pendent ornament, usually of silver, found among relics of the Viking age in the north of Europe. It has somewhat the shape of a mallet, and is undoubtedly intended to represent a hammer as weapon or utensil.—To bring or come to the hammer, to sell or be sold at auction: from the use by auctioneers of a gavel or small hammer to indicate by a rap the sale of an article to the highest bidder, called knocking it down.

Old Sir Robert's pride,
His books — the more the pity, so I said —
Came to the hammer here in March.
Tennyson, Audley Court.

hammock[1] (ham′ok), n. [Formerly hamack (Sir T. Herbert) or, as Sp., hamaca = F. hamac, It. amaca, Pg. maca, OD. hammak, later accom. hangmak, hangmat, G. hangmatte, hängmatte (as if 'hanging mat'), < Sp. hamaca, a hammock; of West Indian origin. Columbus, in the narrative of his first voyage, says: "A great many Indians in canoes came to the ship to-day for the purpose of bartering their cotton, and hamacas or nets in which they sleep."] 1. A kind of hanging bed. Hammocks used at sea, especially on men-of-war, are made of canvas, and have a number of cords at each end, called clues, which are brought together and secured to an iron ring, which is hung on a hook attached to the deck-beams. Those used in the tropical parts of America and in summer in the north are usually formed of a network of Panama grass or small cords.

Sailor's Hammock.

I . . . conducted them into one of the houses, where we did presently hang up our hammocks.
Dampier, Voyages, an. 1688.

Mrs. Trunnion was out of humour when she found herself under the necessity of being confined with her spouse in a hammock. Smollett, Peregrine Pickle, ix.

O mother, praying God will save Thy sailor — while thy head is bow'd,
His heavy-shotted hammock-shroud
Drops in his vast and wandering grave.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, vi.

2. In entom., the hammock-like sack or case carried by the larvæ of certain tineid moths, as Œcophora harrisiella, hence called case-bearers.

If he [P. Huber] took a caterpillar which had completed its hammock up to, say, the sixth stage of construction, and put it into a hammock completed up only to the third stage, the caterpillar simply reperformed the fourth, fifth, and sixth stages of construction.
Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 206.

To lash a hammock (naut.), to roll a hammock up smoothly and pass a lashing round it. — To sling a hammock (naut.), to fasten in the clues of a hammock and get it ready for use.

hammock-batten (ham′o̤k-bat″n), n. A cleat or strip of wood used to extend the ends of a hammock and keep it spread out.

hammock-cloth (ham′o̤k-klôth), n. Naut., a canvas tarpaulin covering the hammocks when in the nettings to protect them from the weather.

hammock-clues (ham′o̤k-klöz), n. pl. An arrangement of small lines at each end of a hammock by which it is suspended.

hammock-nettings (ham′o̤k-net″ingz), n. pl. Long troughs or boxes constructed on top of the bulwarks of the spar-deck in a man-of-war, in which the hammocks are stowed during the daytime. In former times the hammocks were stowed, when not in use, in rope nettings, whence the name.

hammock-rack (ham′o̤k-rak), n. Same as hammock-nettings.

hamose, hamous (hā′mōs, -mus), a. [< L. hamus, a hook.] In bot., same as hamate, 3.

Hampden's case. See case of ship-money, under ship-money.

hamper[1] (ham′pėr), v. t. [< ME. hamperen, hampren (rare), hamper, oppress; origin uncertain; supposed by Skeat to stand for hameren* (the p excrescent), another form of ME. hamelen, mutilate, E. hamble (where b is excrescent); but excrescent p would hardly occur in such a position; the reg. form would be hambren* (cf. ME. hamber, var. of hamer, hammer; E. number, etc.), which could hardly change to hampren; and the senses are too unlike to be immediately connected. A remoter connection, however, may exist; cf. hamble, which is connected, through OHG. ham (hamm-), mutilated, crippled, lame, paralytic, with MHG. hemmen, G. hemmen, stop, hinder, check. With hamble, cf. North. E. hamel, walk lame, Sc. hammle, walk in an ungainly manner, so as to be constantly in danger of stumbling, Sc. hamp, halt in walking, stutter, read with difficulty, hamp, n., a halt in walking, stuttering; E. dial. hammer, stammer. Cf. also Sc. habble, stutter, speak or act confusedly; OD. haperen, stutter, hesitate, D. haperen, falter, hesitate.] 1. To impede in motion or progress; render motion or progress difficult to; shackle; entangle; restrain by force.

Glad Abram, then, to God gives thanks and praise,
Vnbindes his Son, and in his room he laies
A Lamb (there strangely hampered by the head).
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Fathers.

Hem. If he resist, down with him, have no mercy.
First Boor. I warrant you, we'll hamper him.
Fletcher, Beggars' Bush, iii. 1.

Am I over-reach'd? If there be law, I'll hamper ye.
Beau. and Fl., Scornful Lady, iii. 2.

When two substances have different molecular velocities at their common surface of mutual contact, the molecules hamper one another, and energy is lost; this energy takes the form of the energy of electrical displacement.
A. Daniell, Physics, p. 542.

Hence—2. To impede in any way; embarrass; encumber; restrain; perplex.

In lesse than an houre, he so hampred their insolencies, they brought them his two men.
Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, I. 171.

Hampered by restrictions, barred against
By set forms, blinded by forced secresies.
Browning, In a Balcony.

Those regulations by which the French manufacturers were hampered during the last century . . . had no small share in producing the great revolution.
H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 320.

3. To derange or put out of working order, as a piece of mechanism. [Rare.]

I hampered the lock of the library door.
Life of a Lover, vi. 264.

4. To beat. [Prov. Eng.]

hamper[1] (ham'pėr), n. [< hamper[1], v.] 1†. A fetter or some instrument that shackles.

Shacklockes, hampers, gyves, and chains.
W. Browne, Britannia's Pastorals, i. 5.

2. Naut., things collectively, which, though necessary to the equipment of a ship, are in the way at certain times: as, to stow away the top hamper.

hamper[2] (ham'pėr), n. [Formerly also hampire; < ME. hamper, contr. of hanaper, ME. hanypere, the form hanaper continuing in use until recently as a term of office: see hanaper.] 1. A kind of basket or wickerwork receptacle, generally of considerable size, chiefly used as a packing-case.

You shall receive by this Carrier a great Wicker Hamper, with . . . three Barrels of Bologna Olives, with some other Spanish Commodities. Howell, Letters, I. v. 15.

We found a hampire of millons sent to me also.
Pepys, Diary, Sept. 27, 1661.

2. A two-bushel basket for oysters. [New York, U. S.]—3. A measure for fish holding about a bushel. [Virginia, U. S.]—4. Same as hanaper, 4.

hamper[2] (ham'pėr), v. t. [< ME. hamperen; < hamper[2], n.] 1. To put into a hamper: as, to hamper goods.

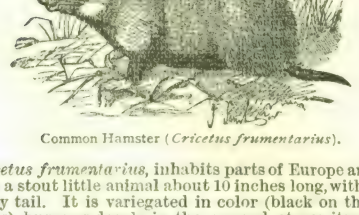
& pyled that precious place & pakked those godes . . . Wyth alle the vrnmentes of that hous, he hamppred togeder. Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), ii. 1284.

2. To load with hampers.



One ass will carry at least three thousand such books, and I am persuaded you would be able to carry as many yourself, if you were well hampered.
N. Bailey, tr. of Colloquies of Erasmus, p. 325.

hampire†, n. See hamper[2].

Hampton Court Conference. See conference.

hamshackle (ham'shak-l), v. t.; pret. and pp. hamshackled, ppr. hamshackling. [Usually explained as ham[1] + shackle, but it is the fore leg that is shackled, and the fore leg is not and has not a ham. Cf. equiv. hapshackle, hopshackle, hobshackle.] To shackle, as a horse or a cow, by a rope or strap attached to the head and to one of the legs, to prevent it from running away or wandering too far; hence, to curb; restrain.

hamster (ham'stėr), n. [= D. Dan. Sw. hamster, < G. hamster, MHG. hamster, hamester (ML. hamester), hamster, < OHG. hamastro, found only in the sense of 'weevil,' = OS. hamstra, weevil; an isolated word, prob. borrowed.] 1. A murine or myomorphic rodent quadruped, of the family Muridæ and subfamily Cricetinæ, and of one of the genera Cricetus, Cricetomys, and Saccostomus. They are furnished with cheek-pouches, which are the principal distinctive character of the group in comparison with other Muridæ. The common hamster, Common Hamster (Cricetus frumentarius).

Cricetus frumentarius, inhabits parts of Europe and Asia. It is a stout little animal about 10 inches long, with a short hairy tail. It is variegated in color (black on the under parts), burrows deeply in the ground, stores its galleries with grain, and hibernates during the colder months. It is very prolific, and readily breeds in confinement. The fur is poor, short, and coarse, but is sometimes used for the lining of cloaks. The other genera above named are African.

2. Some other pouched rodent, as of the genus Geomys, more or less resembling a hamster.—Georgia hamster, Rafinesque's name of the gopher of the southern United States, Geomys tuza.

hamstring (ham'string), n. 1. In human anat., the tendon of a muscle which bounds the ham, or space behind the knee on either side above the middle of the popliteal space. The outer hamstring is single, and is the tendon of the biceps muscle; there are three inner hamstrings, the tendons of the semitendinosus, semimembranosus, and gracilis muscles, with which a fourth, that of the sartorius, may be reckoned. These muscles flex the leg upon the thigh, and, with the exception of the sartorius and gracilis, extend the thigh upon the trunk.

2. In ordinary language, the great tendon or sinew at the back of the so-called knee or hock of the hind leg of a quadruped. It is the tendo Achillis, or tendon of the gastrocnemius muscle, corresponding to that at the back of the human ankle, and extends the foot or pes upon the leg or crus. See cut under horse.

hamstring (ham'string), v. t.; pret. and pp. hamstrung or hamstringed, ppr. hamstringing. [< hamstring, n.] 1. To cut the hamstrings of, and thus lame or disable.

With this instrument they ride at a beast, and surround him, when the hunter that comes behind him hamstrings him. Anson, Voyages, i. 6.

He defended himself desperately, and would have cut his way through them, had they not hamstringed his horse.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., v.

2. In whaling, to cut the muscle or tendons of the small of the whale, so as to render the flukes useless and make the animal helpless. It is done with the fluke-spade when a boat is hauled ★up alongside a running whale.

hamular (ham'ū-lăr), a. [< L. hamul-us + -ar[3].] Same as hamulate.

hamulate (ham'ū-lāt), a. [< L. hamul-us + -ate[1].] 1. In anat. and zoöl., hooked; uncinate: as, the hamulate process of the sphenoid bone. See cut under craniofacial.—2. In bot., having a little hook at the tip; covered with little hooks. Also hamulose, hamulous.

hamule (ham'ūl), n. [< L. hamulus, q. v.] Same as hamulus, 1.

hamuli, n. Plural of hamulus, 1.

hamulose, hamulous (ham'ū-lōs, -lus), a. [< hamule + -ose, -ous.] In bot., same as hamulate, 2.

hamulus (ham'ū-lus), n. [L., dim. of hamus, a hook.] 1. Pl. hamuli (-lī). A little hook or hooklet. Specifically—(a) In anat., a hook-like process of a bone. The hamulus lacrymalis is the hook-like process at the lower end of the vertical ridge of the lacrymal bone, which helps to bound the upper orifice of the lacrymal canal. The hamulus pterygoideus is the hook-like process of the pterygoid portion of the sphenoid bone, over which runs the tendon of the tensor palati muscle. (See cut under craniofacial.) The hamulus laminæ spiralis is the hook-like process in which the osseous spiral lamina ends at the apex of the cochlea. (b) In bot., applied specifically by some authors to the rudimentary axis of the spikelets in the genus Uncinia, which is exserted from the apex of the utricle, and produced into a long awn that is recurved or hooked at the tip, this being the character which chiefly distinguishes that genus from Carex, and especially from Schœnoxiphium, which last has the awn without the hook. See Uncinia. (c) In ornith., the hooklet of a feather; a hooked barbicel; the hooked fringe of a barbule. (d) In entom., one of the minute hooks, forming a row on the anterior margin of the lower wing, found in hymenopterous insects. They can be applied to the hinder margin of the anterior wing, thus binding the two together, and forming a continuous surface during flight. Also called spinula. (e) In obstet., a hook for extracting the fetus; a crotchet. Also called hamule.

2. [cap.] [NL.] In zoöl., a genus of mollusks. Morton, 1834.

hamus (hā'mus), n.; pl. hami (-mī). [L.] A hook; a hamulus. Specifically, in entom., a small hooked process or loop on the lower side of each anterior wing, near the base, found in many Lepidoptera. A bristle called the tendo, on the lower wing, passes through this loop, and aids in keeping the wings together during flight. The hamus, though not the tendo, is said to be peculiar to male insects, and it is found only in strong-flying species.

hant†. An old present indicative plural and infinitive of have, contracted from haven. Chaucer.

Hanafite (han'a-fīt), n. [Ar. Hanafīyah, < Abu Hanifah: see def.] A member of the oldest and most important of the four orthodox sects of Sunnite Mohammedans, founded by Abu Hanifah of Kufah (about A. D. 700–770), a puritan in doctrine and the author of a system of jurisprudence. Also Hanifite.

He was a Sunnite, probably according to the Hanafite rite. Encyc. Brit., XVII. 237.

hanap† (han'ap), n. [ME., < OF. hanap, hanep, henap, henep, hennap, enap, chenap, etc., = Pr. enap = It. anappo, nappo (ML. hanapus), a drinking-cup, < OHG. hnapf, MHG. G. napf = MLG. nap = D. nap = AS. hnæpp, a cup, bowl, basin.] 1. A large drinking-goblet, especially the vessel from which the chief guest at an entertainment or the presiding dignitary was served.

Handled mugs of silver and wood (hanaps), curtains, cloths, and other things necessary for a tavern.
Riley, London Memorials, quoted in N. and Q., [7th ser., I. 457.

Hence—2. A vessel of precious material, as silver or silver gilt, fitted with a cover, from which the taster drank a little wine taken from the hanap.—3. In the fifteenth century, a measure, especially for wine, ale, and the like. It is forbidden, on the ground that it is not a fixed measure, by a regulation of Henry IV.

hanaper (han'a-pėr), n. [< ME. hanypere, < OF. hanapier, hanaper, hanepier, hannepier, henepier, chanapier, etc. (ML. AL. hanaperium), a case for a hanap or drinking-cup, or for other vessels, also the skull, also a helmet or casque, also in AF. and AL. use a case for documents, etc., < hanap, hanep, etc., a drinking-cup: see hanap. Hence, later, by contraction and assimilation, hamper[2], q. v.] 1†. Same as hamper[2], 1. Holland.—2†. Same as hanap, 1.—3. A receptacle for documents or valuable articles, formerly used in England. It was often made of wickerwork, and sometimes covered with leather.—4. [cap.] An office (in full, the Hanaper Office) of the English Court of Chancery, from which various writs were formerly sent out. So called because all writs regarding the public were once kept in a hanaper (in hanaperio), and those concerning the crown in a little sack or bag. Also called Hamper.—Clerk of the Hanaper. See clerk.

Hanbalite (han'bal-īt), n. [< Hanbal (see def.) + -ite[2].] A member of the last of the four orthodox sects of the Sunnite Mohammedans, founded by the imam Ahmad Ibn Hanbal of Bagdad (A. D. 780–855). The Hanbalites were fanatical, and are supposed to be now chiefly represented by the Wahhabees of Arabia.

hance[1]†, v. t. [< ME. hancen, haunsen, raise, increase: see enhance.] To raise; elevate; increase; enhance.

Thou heiztest holichurche to haunsen hire strengthe.
Joseph of Arimathie (E. E. T. S.), p. 8.

hance[2] (hans), n. [Also written hanse, early mod. E. also haunce, haunse; var. hanch, haunch, q. v.] 1. In arch., same as haunch, 6: by older writers more especially applied (a) to the lower part, above the springing, of three- and four-centered arches; (b) to a small arch by which a straight lintel is sometimes united to its jamb or impost.—2. pl. Naut., falls of the fife-rails placed on balusters on the poop and quarter-deck down to the gangway.

hance[3]†, n. See hanse.

hanch (hanch), n. In arch., same as haunch, 6.

hanchet (han'chet), n. In her., a bugle-horn used as a bearing.

hanchinol (hän-chi-nōl'), n. [Mex. Sp.] A shrubby American plant, Heimia salicifolia, belonging to the family Lythraceæ, having lanceolate, often ternate leaves, and solitary yellow flowers. It is said to be sudorific, diuretic, and antisyphilitic. See Heimia. Also written hanchinal.

Hancornia (han-kôr'ni-ą), n. [NL. (Gomes, 1812).] A genus of Brazilian shrubs, belonging to the family Apocynaceæ, tribe Arduineæ, having the stamens included below the apex of the corolla-tube, opposite leaves, and few-flowered terminal cymes. It consists of a single species, H. speciosa, with drooping branches, small, oblong, pointed leaves, and milky juice. The fruit is about as large as a plum, and is said to be delicious when thoroughly ripe. It is called by the Brazilians mangava or mangaba. The juice, when exposed to the air, hardens ★into a kind of caoutchouc.

hand (hand), n. [< ME. hand, hond, < AS. hand, hond = OS. OFries. D. hand = MLG. hant, LG. hand = OHG. MHG. hant, G. hand = Icel. hönd, hand = Sw. hand = Dan. haand = Goth. handus, hand. Root uncertain; usually associated with Goth. hinthan* (pret. hanth*, ppr. hunthans*), take, only in comp. fra-hinthan and us-hinthan, take captive, AS. hentan, ge-hentan, take, seize, huntian, hunt; cf. hent, hint[1], hunt, and see hend, which is a derivative of hand. Cf. finger, in a (supposed) similar relation to fang, take, seize.] 1. The end of the arm or fore limb from the wrist outward, consisting of the palm, fingers, and thumb, and fitted for grasping objects. The perfect development of the hand is found only in man; but other animals, as monkeys, mice, squirrels, opossums, and other mammals, possess prehensile paws, or hands in a broad sense of the word. In man the fore limb is entirely withdrawn from the offices of support and locomotion, at least in adult life, and is devoted to the function of prehension, for which it is perfectly adapted by the mobility of all the digits, as well as by their respective difference in total length and in the length of their joints, and especially by the great freedom of the thumb, which can be perfectly apposed to the fingers collectively or to any one of them. Another important point in the perfection of a hand is its capability of complete pronation and supination, a movement of rotation following the motion of the radius about the ulna, by which the palm may be brought uppermost, when the hand is supine, or turned downward, when the hand is prone. None of the pronator or supinator muscles actually reach the hand, which simply carries out the movement of the radius. In the human hand there are 27 bones, namely, 8 carpals or wrist-bones proper, 5 metacarpals, and 14 phalanges, 3 to each of the four fingers and 2 to the thumb. The muscles which actuate the hand are numerous: they consist of several carpal extensors and flexors; several "long" common and special extensors and flexors of the digits, those of the thumb being most numerous and highly specialized; and certain "short" muscles confined to the palm, as those of the base of the thumb. (See cut under muscle.) In most mammals which have hands in this sense the structure and composition of parts are similar, the anatomical differences being slight in comparison with the degrees of physiological adaptation to prehension, or functional efficiency.

Bones of Right Human Hand, palmar surface, being the third segment of the fore limb, divided into carpus, metacarpus, and phalanges.

sc, scaphoid; l, semilunar; c, cuneiform; p, pisiform; t, trapezium; t_3, trapezoid; m, magnum; u, unciform: these being the carpal bones, in two series, proximal and distal: m_1 to m_5, the first to the fifth metacarpals, constituting the metacarpus; P_1 to P_3, the 14 phalanges.

In his hand he baar a myghty bowe.
Chaucer, Gen. Prol. to C. T., l. 108.

The fyngres fourmen a ful hande to purtreye or peynten Keruynge and compassynge as crafte of the fyngres.
Piers Plowman (B), xvii. 169.

In colour like the fingers of a hand
Before a burning taper. Tennyson, Holy Grail.

The Gorilla's hand is clumsier, heavier, and has a thumb somewhat shorter in proportion than that of man; but no one has ever doubted its being a true hand.
Huxley, Man's Place in Nature, p. 108.

2. In anat., technically, the terminal segment of the fore limb of any vertebrate above fishes, consisting of three divisions, the carpus, metacarpus, and phalanges; the manus: the correlative of the pes of the hind limb. In this sense the term hand is used irrespective of modifications in structure or function. See manus, and cut under pinion.—3. The end of any limb which grasps, holds, or clings, as the hind foot of a monkey, a bat, an opossum, etc. Specifically—(a) In falconry, the foot of a hawk. (b) In the manège, a horse's fore foot. (c) In entom., the tarsus of the anterior leg: a term used by old writers, and corresponding to the manus of Kirby. (d) In crustaceans, the chelate claw, or chela, technically called manus. See cut under chela.

4. A measure of four inches; a palm: used chiefly in measuring the height of horses: as, a horse 14 hands high.—5. Side; part; direction, to either right or left: used both literally and figuratively: as, on the one hand or the other.

hang (hang), v.; pret. and pp. hung or hanged ★(the latter obsolete except in sense 2), ppr. hanging. [In mod. E. hang (dial. also hing, heng, formerly also hank) are mixed two orig. distinct forms: (1) Hang, weak verb (pret. and pp. hanged), prop. intr., < ME. hangen, hongen, hangien, hongien (pret. hanged, hangede, hongede, pp. hanged, honged), prop. intr., but also tr., < AS. hangian, hongian (pret. hangode, hongode, pp. hangod* not found), only intr., hang, be suspended, depend, = OS. hangōn, intr., = OFries. hangia, hingia, North Fries. hangen, hingen, intr. and tr., = D. hangen, intr. and tr., = MLG. hangen = OHG. hangēn, MHG. hangen, intr. (cf. OHG. MHG. hengen, also henken, G. hängen, also henken, tr., hang), = Icel. hengja, tr., = Sw. hänga, intr. and tr., = Dan. hænge, intr. and tr.: a secondary verb, from the next. (2) Hang (this pres. from the pp., or from pres. of preceding), orig. strong verb (pret. and pp. hung, the mod. pret. being taken from the pp., and this representing ME. honge for hongen, hangen), prop. tr., < ME. hangen (this pres. as in mod. pres.; pret. heng, hing, pl. hengen, hingen, pp. hangen, hongen, honge, ihonge), tr. and intr., < AS. hōn (pret. hēng, pl. hēngon, pp. hangen), only tr., = OS. hāhan*, only in comp. pp. bi-hangan = OFries. hūa, tr., = MLG. hān = OHG. hāhan, tr., MHG. hāhen, tr. and intr., G. hangen (pret. hieng, hing, pp. gehangen), intr., = Icel. hanga (pret. hékk, pp. hanginn), intr., = Goth. hahan (pret. redupl. (us-)haihan, pp. (at-)hahans), strong verb, tr., hang, but found in the simple form only in the sense of 'cause to hesitate, leave in doubt,' in comp. at-hahan, let hang, let down, us-hahan, hang (by the neck), also weak verb (pret. hahaida), intr., be attentive, hanker (to hear; cf. 'hang on one's words'). The AS. hōn, Goth. hahan, etc., are contr. from orig. hanhan*, which agrees in form, as the words, esp. the Goth., agree partly in sense, with L. cunctari (a freq. form), hesitate, delay, Skt. √ çank, hesitate, doubt; but the supposed connection is doubtful; the lit. and simple meaning 'hang' (intr.) would naturally be oldest. The phonetic history of hang is similar to that of fang, q. v.] I. trans. 1. To fasten or attach so as to be supported from above and not from below; suspend.

In thy temple I wol my baner honge, hanseatic (han-sē-at'ik), a. [< hanse[1] + -at-ic.] Pertaining to a hanse or league; specifically [cap.], pertaining or relating to the league of the Hanse towns.—Hanseatic league, or the German Hanse, or Hansa, a medieval confederation of cities of northern Germany and adjacent countries, called the Hanse towns, at one time numbering about ninety, with affiliated cities in nearly all parts of Europe, for the promotion of commerce by sea and land, and for its protection against pirates, robbers, and hostile governments. At the height of its prosperity it exercised sovereign powers, made treaties, and often enforced its claims by arms in Scandinavia, England, Portugal, and elsewhere. Its origin is commonly dated from a compact between Hamburg and Lübeck in 1241, although commercial unions of German towns had existed previously. The league held triennial general assemblies, usually at Lübeck, its chief seat; and after a long period of decline, and attempts at resuscitation, the last general assembly, representing six cities, was held in 1669. The name was retained, however, by the union of the free cities of Lübeck, Hamburg, and Bremen, which are now members of the German empire.

hanse-house (hans'hous), n. Formerly, in England, a house used by a corporation of merchants for the display and sale of goods.

In some places in England there were hans-houses, which were probably used as the headquarters of these great sales or fairs, just as very many parishes used to have a so-called "Church House" for public purposes. English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 357, note.

Its species are small, and are distinguished by their green or whitish abdomen with conspicuous white or reddish spots, and by their angled hind wings. The larvæ bear strong spines, upon which they fasten the debris of the plants upon which they feed. H. rubivora (Riley) subsists in the larval state on the leaves and fruit of the raspberry.

Raspberry-Geometer (Haplodes rubivora).

a, larva (natural size) on a berry; b, abdominal segment of larva, lateral view, highly magnified; c, moth, natural size; d, outline of wings of moth, enlarged.

Haplodinotus (hap″lō-di-nō′tus), n. [NL. (Rafinesque, 1819), < Gr. ἁπλόος, simple, + δι-, in sense of 'second,' + νῶτος, back, i. e., dorsal fin.] A genus of sciænoid fishes peculiar to the great fresh-water lakes and the Mississippi valley, typical of the subfamily Haplodinotinæ, represented by H. grunniens, the fresh-water drum, sheepshead, or thunder-pumper. Also called Amblodon. Originally spelled Aplodinotus.

Haplodon (hap′lō-don), n. [NL., written in various forms (see def. 1), but prop. only Haploödon or Hapludon, Haploödus or Hapludus, < Gr. ἁπλόος, single, + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] 1. The typical and only genus of rodents of the family Haplodontidæ. H. rufus or Aplodontia rufa is the sewellel or Rocky Mountain beaver. Also Sewellel (Aplodontia rufa).

Haploödon, Haploudon, Hapludon, Haplodus, Haploödus, Haploudus, Hapludus, and in extended form Aplodontia, Aploudontia, Apludontia, Apludontia, Haploudontia. The original form in mammalogy was Aplodontia (Richardson, 1829).

2. A genus of elasmobranchiate fishes. Münster, 1840.

haplodont (hap′lō-dont), a. and n. [< NL. haplodon(t-) (see Haplodon), < Gr. ἁπλόος, single, + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] I. a. 1. In odontog., having the crowns of the molar teeth simple or single—that is, not divided into ridges, tubercles, etc.—2. In zoöl.: (a) Pertaining to the Haplodontidæ. (b) Pertaining to the Haplodontia; edentate.

II. n. One of the Haplodontidæ.

Haplodontia[1] (hap-lō-don′ti-ạ), n. [NL., fem. sing.: see Haplodon.] Same as Haplodon.

Haplodontia[2] (hap-lō-don′ti-ạ), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of haplodon(t-): see haplodont.] An order of placental Mammalia, consisting of the Edentata of Cuvier with the omission of the Monotremata; one of two orders constituting Blyth's phytophagous mammals. [Not in use.]

Haplodontidæ (hap-lō-don′ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Haplodon(t-) + -idæ.] A family of rodents, typified by the genus Haplodon and nearly related to the Castoridæ or beavers; the sewellels. They have 1 incisor on each side above and below, no canines, 2 premolars in each upper and 1 in each lower half-jaw, and 3 molars on both sides above and below, the molars being rootless, prismatic in section, and with simple crowns. The clavicles are perfect; the tibia and fibula are not ankylosed; there are 9 carpal and 9 tarsal bones; the skull is massive, greatly depressed, broad behind, and with flaring zygomata and no postorbital processes; the mandible is massive, with a twisted, laminar, descending ramus and a high coronoid process; there is a large hyoid bone; the salivary glands are enormous, the stomach has a cardiac prolongation; the intestine is about eleven times longer than the body; the cæcum is large; the outlets of the genital and urinary organs are separate; the testes are abdominal; and the large penis-bone is cleft at the end. They are peculiar to North America. See sewellel, and cut under Haplodon.

haplogonidium (hap″lō-gō-nid′i-um), n.; pl. haplogonidia (-ạ). [NL., < Gr. ἁπλόος, simple, + NL. gonidium.] See gonidium, 3.

haplogonimium (hap″lō-gō-nim′i-um), n.; pl. haplogonimia (-ạ). [NL., < Gr. ἁπλόος, simple, + NL. gonimium.] See gonidium, 3, and gonimium. Crombie.

haplography (hap-log′rạ-fi), n. [< Gr. ἁπλόος, single, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] In paleography and textual criticism: (a) A copyist's mechanical or inadvertent omission of a letter, or of a series of letters or words, repeated in immediate succession in the passage of the original manuscript copied. Errors of this kind were frequently made by ancient copyists, owing to non-separation of words in manuscripts. An example in English would be, if in copying AN DISSENT TO YOU ('and is sent to you'), one s should be dropped, so as to read, and I sent to you.' (b) A reading originating in such an omission. See dittography.

Haplolæneæ (hap-lō-lē′nē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἁπλόος, single, + (?) λᾶινος, of stone, < λᾶας, a stone.] A tribe of frondose liverworts (Hepaticæ), of the family Jungermanniaceæ, proposed by Nees von Esenbeck in 1838, and characterized by a one-leafed involucre without any true perianth, a spherical capsule, and dichotomous-ribbed fronds. It is now included in the subfamily Metzgerioideæ.

haploma (hap-lō′mạ), n. [< Gr. ἅπλωμα, a cloth or coverlet: see haplome.] Same as ependytes (b).

haplome (hap′lōm), n. [Orig., but less prop., aplome (Haüy, 1801); < Gr. ἅπλωμα, that which is unfolded, an expanse, also a table-cloth or coverlet, < ἁπλοῦν, unfold, make single, < ἁπλόος, contr. ἁπλοῦς, simple, single, < ἀ- copulative + -πλοος, -fold: see diploë, diploma, etc.] A rare variety of garnet, found in dodecahedrons with rhombic faces.

Haplomorpha (hap-lō-môr′fạ), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of haplomorphus: see haplomorphous.] 1. In some systems of classification, a group of true craspedote medusans, typical acalephs, or ordinary jelly-fishes, corresponding nearly or exactly with Hydrophora of some and Trachymedusæ of other writers. See Trachymedusæ.—2. A division of opisthobranchiate gastropods, of small size and simple form, having no ctenidia, cerata, or other processes of the body-wall. The families Phyllirhoidæ and Elysiidæ represent this division: same as Abranchia (b).

haplomorphic (hap-lō-môr′fik), a. [< Haplomorpha + -ic.] Same as haplomorphous.

haplomorphous (hap-lō-môr′fus), a. [< NL. haplomorphus, < Gr. ἁπλόος, simple, + μορφή, form.] Being of simple form; specifically, pertaining to or having the characters of the Haplomorpha.

Haplomycetes (hap″lō-mī-sē′tēz), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἁπλόος, single, + μύκης (μυκητ-), a mushroom.] A name given by Fries to a heterogeneous group of fungi in which the hyphæ are rather simple or floccose. It was composed chiefly of what are now classed as Hyphomycetes, but the black molds (Mucoraceæ) and the rusts (Uredinales) were also included.

haplomycetous (hap″lō-mī-sē′tus), a. Having the structure or appearance of the Haplomycetes.

Haploöphonæ (hap″lō-ō-fō′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἁπλόος, single, + φωνή, voice, sound.] 1. In J. Müller's system of classification, a group of passerine birds having a simple bronchotracheal syrinx, as the tyrant-flycatchers: it corresponds to Clamatores or Oligomyodi and is contrasted with Tracheophonæ.—2. In Garrod and Forbes's arrangement, a division of Passeres, consisting of the family Tyrannidæ and the genus Rupicola of South America, together with the old-world Pittidæ, Philepittidæ, and Xenicidæ (or Acanthisittidæ): opposed to Tracheophones.

haploöphonous (hap″lō-ō-fō′nus), a. [As Haploöphonæ + -ous.] Having the characters of the Haploöphonæ; oligomyodian.

Haplopappus (hap-lō-pap′us), n. [NL., < Gr. ἁπλόος, single, + πάππος, seed-down (pappus): see pappus.] A name given by Endlicher in 1838 to Hoorebekia, a South American genus of Asteraceæ with yellow flowers. It is allied to Solidago, but has larger many-flowered heads, a reddish hue of the pappus, and is of very different habits. These plants are of no known economic value. The type species, Hoorebekia Chiloensis, as its name indicates, is a native of Chile.

haplopetalous (hap-lō-pet′ạ-lus), a. [< Gr. ἁπλόος, single, + πέταλον, leaf (petal).] In bot., having only one row or circle of petals.

haplosiphoniate (hap″lō-sī-fō′ni-āt), a. [< NL. haplosiphonia (see def.), < Gr. ἁπλόος, single, + σίφων, siphon.] Pertaining to or having the characters of that series of batrachians known as Aglossa haplosiphonia. See Aglossa.

Haplostemmæ (hap-lō-stem′ē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἁπλόος, simple, + στέμμα, wreath, crown.] A division of the family of plants Asclepiadaceæ, having the crown of stamens simple and consisting of five entire or slightly bifid pieces inserted on the base of the gynostegium. Decaisne, 1844.

haplostemonous (hap-lō-stem′ō-nus), a. [< Gr. ἁπλόος, single, + στήμων, a thread: see stamen.] In bot., having a single series or circle of stamens. Also aplostemonous.

(b) Any state of being, having considerable permanence, in which pleasure decidedly predominates over pain.

Dead and inglorious,
Like beast whose breath but in his nostrels is,
And hath no hope of happinesse or blis.
Spenser, Ruins of Time, l. 358.

O happiness, our being's end and aim!
Good, pleasure, ease, content, whate'er thy name;
That something still which prompts the eternal sigh,
For which we bear to live, or dare to die!
Pope, Essay on Man, iv. 1.

Happiness, . . . in its full extent, is the utmost pleasure we are capable of.
Locke, Human Understanding, II. xxi. 42.

The word happy is a relative term; in strictness, any condition may be denominated happy in which the amount or aggregate of pleasure exceeds that of pain; and the degree of happiness depends upon the quantity of this excess. Paley, Moral Philos., i. 6.

Every man speaks of happiness as his end of ends: he wishes to live well or to do well, which he considers to be the same as being happy. But men disagree exceedingly in their opinions as to that which constitutes happiness: nay, the same man sometimes places it in one thing, sometimes in another — in health or in riches, according as he happens to be sick or poor. Grote, Aristotle.

(c) Fortuitous aptness or fitness; an unstudied grace or beauty; felicitousness.

How pregnant sometimes his replies are! a happiness that often madness hits on. Shak., Hamlet, ii. 2.

Certain graces and happinesses peculiar to every language give life and energy to the words. Sir J. Denham.

Ye powers who rule the tongue, if such there are,
And make colloquial happiness your care.
Cowper, Conversation, l. 82.

Both show a wide knowledge of human nature, and a great happiness in sketching the details of individual manners. Ticknor, Span. Lit., I. 77.

=Syn. Happiness, Felicity, Blessedness, Bliss; well-being, prosperity, welfare, enjoyment, comfort, security. Happiness, the generic word, is expressive of nearly every general state of pleasure. It is so far from its derivation that it is often expressive of that state of mind that triumphs over circumstances, finding material for contentment or even joy in that which might naturally produce deep unhappiness. Felicity is primarily a matter of favorable circumstances, which may be mere exemption from disaster or disagreeable experiences, or may be of a higher type, as domestic felicity depends not merely upon the comfort of the home, nor upon freedom from anxiety, but especially upon a high degree of mutual love. Blessedness is a state of the most refined happiness, arising from the purest and warmest benevolent and religious feeling. The type of its meaning is furnished by the use of the word blessed in the beatitudes, Mat. v. 3–11. Bliss is consummate happiness. See animation, mirth, hilarity, gladness.

happing (hap'ing), n. [Verbal n. of hap[2], v.] Same as hap[2].

Imagining how to purchase
Grace of the quene there to bide
Till good fortune some happy guide
Me send might. Isle of Ladies, l. 280.

I shall have share in this most happy wrack.
Shak., T. N., v. 1.

A proclaim'd prize! Most happy! Shak., Lear, iv. 6.

Chemists have been more happy in finding experiments than the causes of them. Boyle.

In happy time behold our pilot-star!
Tennyson, Pelleas and Ettarre.

2. Conscious that one's general condition of feeling is a highly satisfactory one; conscious that one feels, in general, decidedly more pleasure than pain; having a general feeling of pleasure; satisfied; pleased.

He may make us both happy in an hour;
Win some five thousand pound, and send us two on't.
B. Jonson, Alchemist, i. 1.

Make such a one thy friend, in whom princes may be happy, and great counsels successful.
Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., iii. 18.

How happy could I be with either,
Were t'other dear charmer away!
Gay, Beggar's Opera, ii. 2.

"O happy world," thought Pelleas, "all, meseems, Are happy; I the happiest of them all."
Nor slept that night for pleasure in his blood.
Tennyson, Pelleas and Ettarre.

3. Being in a favorable condition or in advantageous circumstances; fortunate; secure of good; blessed.

And this Pamphilus saith also; If thou be right happy, that is to sayn, if thou be right riche, thou shalte finde a gret nomber of felawes and frendes.
Chaucer, Tale of Melibeus.

Calling him happy who had Homer to blaze abroad his praises to the world. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 328.

4. Affording pleasure or enjoyment; bringing or attended with good fortune, luck, or pleasure; agreeable: as, happy thoughts; a happy condition; happier times.

For thee I longde to liue, for thee nowe welcome death:
And welcome be that happie pang that stops my gasping breath. Gascoigne, In Trust is Treason.

All places that the eye of heaven visits
Are to a wise man ports and happy havens.
Shak., Rich. II., i. 3.

This happy place, our sweet Recess, and only consolation left Familiar to our eyes. Milton, P. L., xi. 303.

A sorrow's crown of sorrow is remembering happier things.
Tennyson, Locksley Hall.

5. Indicative or expressive of happiness; joyful: as, the happy shouts of children; happy smiles or tears.

The delight of happy laughter,
The delight of low replies.
Tennyson, Maud, xxvi.

6. Apt; fitting the purpose, occasion, or circumstances; opportune; felicitous: as, a happy expedient; a happy retort.

Saint Dennis bless this happy stratagem!
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., iii. 2.

This fell out strangely happy.
Middleton (and others), The Widow, ii. 2.

With twisted quirks and happy hits,
From misty men of letters.
Tennyson, Will Waterproof.

Swift, Thoughts on Various Subjects.

One gentleman is happy at a reply, another excels in a rejoinder. Swift.

Happy despatch, family, hunting-ground, etc. See the nouns.—Happy man be his dole†. See dole[1].=Syn. Happy, Felicitous, Fortunate, Lucky. Felicitous is now rarely used except in the sense of apt and pleasing, a sense in which happy also is used: as, a felicitous or happy combination, answer, speech. Fortunate and lucky, by their derivations, are a higher and a lower term for the prosperous turns of chance or the lot in life. Happy, though essentially the same by derivation, has a broader application; it is never altogether separated from the idea of enjoyment. See happiness.

happy† (hap'i), v. t. [< happy, a.] To make happy.

By th' one hee happied his own Soule with Rest;
By th' other also, hee his People blest.
Sylvester, St. Lewis (trans.), l. 75.

hara-kiri (har′ä-kir′ē), n. [Jap., < hara, belly, + kiri, cutting, cut. Erroneously written hari-kari, harri-karri, in riming conformation.] 1. Suicide by disembowelment, formerly practised in Japan by daimios and members of the military class when unwilling to survive some personal or family disgrace, or in order to avoid the headsman's sword after having received sentence of death. In the latter case the act was performed in the presence of witnesses, and was accompanied by elaborate formalities. At the moment the suicide ripped open his abdomen with his dirk his head was struck off by the sword of his second, who was usually a kinsman or an intimate friend.

According to one authority, capital punishment may be divided into two kinds — beheading and strangulation. The ceremony of hara-ki-i was added afterwards in the case of persons belonging to the military class being condemned to death. This was first instituted in the days of the Ashikaga dynasty (1336–1568 A. D.).
A. B. Mitford, Old Japan, p. 330.

2. Hence, suicide; self-destruction.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 449.

By their virtuous behaviour they compensate the hardness of their favour. Ray.

With respect to hardness, we know nothing of it by sense farther than that the parts of hard bodies resist the motion of our hands on coming into contact with them.
Descartes, Prin. of Philos. (tr. by Veitch), ii. § 4.

Specifically—2. That quality in fountain-water which is imparted by the presence in excess of earthy salts, especially calcium sulphate.

It is possible to improve . . . hard water . . . by simply adding lime-water to water the hardness of which is to be corrected. Huxley, Physiography, p. 119.

The hardness shown by unboiled water is called total hardness. Thausing, Beer (trans.), p. 135.

3. In med., that quality of the pulse which is due to tension of the artery, which in this condition does not readily yield to the pressure of the finger.

Hardness of the pulse is usually said to be an indication for bleeding, . . . but it is necessary to discriminate carefully between the hardness due to tension of the sound artery . . . and that due to arterial degeneration with more or less hard deposit in the walls of the vessels.
Quain, Med. Dict.

4. In art and music, harshness or coldness of execution; unsympathetic treatment, as of a tone or the details of a picture, want of feeling in performance.—5. In mineral., the comparative capacity of a substance to scratch another or be scratched by another; the quality of bodies which enables them to resist abrasion of their surfaces. Scales have been constructed in which a set of standard bodies are arranged and numbered, and other bodies are referred to this scale in respect of hardness. The diamond is the hardest body known, and in the scale of Mohs its hardness is indicated by the number 10. The scale is as follows: Talc, 1; rock-salt, 2; calcite, 3; fluor-spar, 4; apatite, 5; feldspar, 6; rock-crystal, 7; topaz, 8; corundum, 9; diamond, 10.

hard-shell (härd'shel), a. and n. I. a. 1. In zoöl., having a hard shell. Specifically applied — (a) to the hard clam, round clam, or quahog, Venus mercenaria; (b) to the common edible crab, Callinectes hastatus, when its shell is grown hard: distinguished from soft-shell.

2. Rigidly and narrowly orthodox; conservative; uncompromising. [Colloq., U. S.]

She recognized the drawl of an old hard-shell preacher who at long intervals came to hold forth in the neighborhood. The Century, XXXVI. 897.

Hard-shell Baptists. See baptist, 2.

II. n. 1. A hard-shelled crab or clam. — 2. See Hard, n., 5 (a).

hard-shelled (härd'sheld), a. Same as hard-shell.

Oh, you hard-shelled, unplastic, insulated Englishmen! You introduce towels and fresh water, and tea, and beefsteak, wherever you go, it is true; but you teach high prices, and swindling, and insolence likewise!
B. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 256.

hardship (härd'ship), n. [< ME. herdschipe, also hardischipe; < hard + -ship.] 1. Severe labor or want; suffering or excessive toil, physical or mental; adversity; affliction; also, anything that exacts physical or mental endurance.

They admitted of bondage, with danger of conscience, rather then to indure these hardships.
Bradford, Plymouth Plantation, p. 23.

Heroes are always drawn bearing sorrows, struggling with adversities, undergoing all kinds of hardships, and having in the service of mankind a kind of appetite to difficulties and dangers. Spectator, No. 312.

2. Hard treatment; injury; oppression; injustice.

They are ripe for a peace, to enjoy what we have conquered for them; and so are we, to recover the effects of their hardships upon us. Swift.

=Syn. 1. Trial, burden, grievance, trouble.

hardtack (härd'tak), n. 1. Large, coarse, hard biscuit baked without salt and kiln-dried, much used by sailors and soldiers; ship-biscuit. — 2. ★Same as hardhead, 6. [Georgia, U. S.]

hardtail (härd'tāl), n. A carangoid fish, the yellow mackerel, Caranx pisquetus.

hard-visaged (härd'viz″ājd), a. Having harsh features; ill-favored.

hardware (härd'wār), n. 1. Small metal articles, such as house- or carriage-trimmings, fittings, parts of machines, domestic and kitchen utensils and appliances, and small tools. For more convenient classification, such material is called builders' hardware, domestic hardware, carriage-hardware, etc.

2. Alcoholic liquors. [Colloq., Newfoundland.]

hardwareman (härd'wār-man), n.; pl. hardwaremen (-men). A maker or seller of hardware.

Work for silversmiths, watch-makers, and hardwaremen.
The Century, XXIV. 653.

Hardwickia (härd-wik'i-ä), n. [NL. (Roxburgh, 1819), named after Major-General Thomas Hardwick of the British army.] A genus of plants, belonging to the family Cæsalpiniaceæ, tribe Cynometreæ, characterized by slender paniculate racemes of flowers having 5 strongly imbricated sepals and 10 stamens, 1 to 3 of which are sometimes reduced to staminodia. The genus embraces a single species, H. Binata, a native of India. It is a thornless deciduous tree with spreading branches and pinnate leaves. It attains a maximum height of 120 feet, and inhabits southern and central India. The heart-wood is dark reddish-brown or nearly black, fine-grained, very hard, and durable. It is perhaps the heaviest wood in India, splits easily, and does not warp. It is very valuable for posts, railroad-ties, and underground work. The bark furnishes a valuable fiber for cordage. Kingiodendron pinnatum was formerly referred to this genus and has similar but less-marked properties. It grows in the western Ghats from South Kanara to Travancore. Both plants exude a balsam similar to copaiba. That of K. pinnatum hardens into a resin, or forms an oleo-resin.

hardwood-tree (härd'wud-trē), n. A handsome West Indian shrub or small tree, Ixora ferrea, belonging to the family Rubiaceæ, having oblong, pointed leaves and axillary corymbs of rose-colored flowers. See hackia.

hardy[1] (här'di), a.; compar. hardier, superl. hardiest. [< ME. hardy, hardi, < OF. hardi (F. hardi), hardy, daring, stout, bold, usually regarded as the pp. of hardir, ardir (= Pr. ardir = It. ardire), be bold, make bold, < OHG. hartjan* = E. hard, v.) (cf. OF. enhardi, emboldened, pp. of enhardir, embolden), but perhaps directly < OHG. harti, herti, MHG. herti, another form of OHG. MHG. hart = E. hard: cf. MLG. herdich, persevering, = ODan. hærdig = Norw. herdig = Sw. härdig, vigorous, courageous (Dan. ihærdig = Sw. ihärdig, persevering). Hardy is thus a doublet of hard: see hard.] 1. Bold; intrepid; daring; confident; audacious.

But there is no man in the World so hardy, Cristene man ne other, but that he wolde ben adrad for to beholde it.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 282.

That you be never so hardy to come again in his affairs.
Shak., T. N., ii. 2.

The Indians were so hardy as they came close up to them, notwithstanding their pieces.
Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 254.

Be not so hardy, scullion, as to slay
One nobler than thyself.
Tennyson, Gareth and Lynette.

2. Requiring or imparting courage, vigor, and endurance; that must be done boldly or energetically: as, a hardy exploit; hardy occupations.

He turned with impatience from his literary tutors to military exercises and the hardiest sports.
Motley, Dutch Republic, III. 368.

3. Strong; enduring; capable of resisting fatigue, hardship, or exposure: as, a hardy peasant; a hardy plant.

Lone flower, hemmed in with snows and white as they,
But hardier far. Wordsworth, Sonnets, ii. 16.

And every hardy plant could bear
Loch Katrine's keen and searching air.
Scott, L. of the L., i. 26.

The emigrant's children have grown up, the hardy offspring of the new clime. Everett, Orations, I. 201.

=Syn. 1. Stout-hearted, courageous, valiant, daring. See note under hardihood. — 3. Hale, robust, sturdy, tough.

hardy[1] (här'di), v. i.; pret. and pp. hardied, ppr. hardying. [< hardy, a.] To become hardy, daring, or audacious. [Rare.]

hare[1] (hār), n. [< ME. hare, < AS. hara = OFries. hase = MD. haese, D. haas = MLG. hase = OHG. haso, MHG. G. hase = Icel. hēri (for heri) = Sw. Dan. hare (< Teut. stem hasan-*) = W. ceinach = OPruss. sasins = Skt. çaça (for casa*), a hare.] 1. A rodent quadruped of the family Leporidæ and genus Lepus. It has four upper front teeth instead of only two as usual in Rodentia (the extra pair placed behind the others), long mobile ears, short cocked-up tail, lengthened hind limbs, furry soles, and cleft upper lip. The species are numerous, and are found in most countries, especially of the northern hemisphere; they are much alike, all nearly resembling the common hare of Europe, Lepus timidus. This animal in northerly and alpine countries turns more or less completely white in winter, and is then known as the varying hare. The polar hare, known as Lepus arcticus or glacialis, is the extreme phase of the same species; the American representative is L. americanus. The western American Varying Hare (Lepus americanus).

United States harbor several very large, long-eared, long-limbed hares, such as L. campestris (which whitens in winter), L. callotis, and others, commonly known as jack-rabbits or jackass-rabbits. (See cut under jack-rabbit.) Some hares are partly aquatic, as L. aquaticus of the southern United States. The hare is proverbial for its timidity and fleetness, and for its instinctive ingenuity in eluding enemies. The pursuit of it with hounds is called coursing, and has been a favorite sport from remote times. The rabbit, belonging to the same genus, is often included under the general term hare, and differs from it chiefly in its smaller size, and in its habit of burrowing instead of constructing forms in the grass as the hare does. See rabbit.

He is so gode a knyght that alle other be but as heres as in comparison to hym, saf only his brother.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 162.

The melancholy hare is form'd in brakes and briers.
Drayton, Polyolbion, ii. 204.

The tim'rous hare . . . scarce shuns me.
Cowper, Task, vi. 305.

2. [cap.] In astron., one of the forty-eight ancient constellations of Ptolemy, situated in the southern hemisphere. — First catch your hare. See catch[1]. — Hare and hounds. (a) An outdoor game modeled after the hunting of hares with hounds. Two players known as hares start off on a long run or ride, scattering behind them small pieces of paper called the scent; the others, known as the hounds, following the trail so marked, try to catch the hares before they reach home again.

"Well, my little fellows," began the Doctor, . . . "what makes you so late?" "Please, sir, we've been out Big-side Hare-and-hounds, and lost our way."
T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, i. 7.

(b†) Everybody; people generally.

But Antenor, he shal come hom to toune,
And she shal out — thus seyde here and houne.
Chaucer, Troilus, iv. 210.

Little chief hare. See Lagomys and pika. — Mad as a March hare, acting wildly or senselessly; strangely freakish: in allusion to the wild actions of the hare during the breeding-season in spring. — To hunt for hares with a tabor†, to engage in a hopeless task. Davies.

Men mygtten as well haue huntyd an hare with a tabre,
As aske ony mendis ffor that thei mysdede.
Richard the Redeless, i. 58.

The poore man that gives but his bare fee, or perhaps pleads in forma pauperis, he hunteth for hares with a taber, and gropeth in the darke to find a needle in a botle of hay.
Greene, Quip for an Upstart Courtier (Harl. Misc., V. 407).

To make a hare of, to hoax or befool; ridicule; expose or show up to derision. (See also calling-hare.) hare[2]† (hār), v. t. [= E. dial. harr, < ME. harien, harren, drag by force, ill-treat; either the same as harien for herien, hergien, E. harry, q. v., or < OF. harier, harry, hurry, trouble, disturb, importune, annoy; perhaps also confused with OF. harer (un chien), set (a dog) on, encourage; cf. haro, harrow, an exclamation; crier haro, cry harrow: see harrow[3].] To harass; worry; frighten.

I' the name of men or beasts, what do you do?
Hare the poor fellow out of his five wits
And seven senses. B. Jonson, Tale of a Tub, ii. 1.

But the poor creature was so hared by the council of officers that he presently caused a proclamation to be issued out, by which he did declare the parliament to be dissolved. Clarendon, Civil Wars, III. 660.

To hare and rate them thus at every turn is not to teach them, but to vex and torment them to no purpose. Locke, Education, § 67.

hare[3]†, pron. See he[1], I., D (b).

harebell (hãr′bel), n. [< ME. harebelle, glossing L. bursa pastoris, shepherd's-purse (not in AS.); < hare[1] + bell[1]. Many plants take their popular names from familiar animals without obvious reason; cf. harefoot, hare's-foot, hare-mint, hare's-ear, etc.] 1. A species of bell-flower, Campanula rotundifolia, the well-known bluebell of Scotland. It is a low herb with delicate, drooping, blue, bell-shaped flowers, and linear-lanceolate stem-leaves, those near the root being round-heart-shaped or ovate, but early disappearing, so as rarely to be seen with the flowers. It is common to both Europe and North America. The name is sometimes erroneously written hairbell; Lindley endeavored to restrict that spelling to this plant, reserving the spelling harebell for Scilla nonscripta (def. 2).

Harebell, or Bluebell (Campanula rotundifolia).

The azur'd hare-bell, like thy veins. Shak., Cymbeline, iv. 2.

E'en the slight hare-bell raised its head,
Elastic, from her airy tread. Scott, L. of the L., i. 18.

An Alpine harebell hung with tears
By some cold morning glacier. Tennyson, Princess, vii.

2. The wild hyacinth, Scilla nonscripta (Hyacinthus nonscriptus of Linnæus). [Scotch; rarely so used in English works.]

harebrain (hãr′brãn), a. and n. [< hare[1] + brain. Also written, incorrectly, hairbrain, as if < hair[1] + brain.] I. a. Same as harebrained.

I meane it (saith the king) by that same haire-braine wild fellow, my subject, the Earle of Suffolke, who is protected in your countrie, and begins to play the foole, when all others are wearie of it. Bacon, Hist. Hen. VII., p. 223.

It certainly will not put him in a position to carry out any of the hairbrain schemes of economic policy. The American, XII. 309.

II. n. A giddy or reckless person.

Ah foolish harebraine,
This is not she. Udall, Roister Doister, i. 4.

Look into our histories, and you shall almost meet with no other subject, but what a company of hare-brains have done in their rage. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 169.

harebrained (hãr′brãnd), a. [< hare[1] + brain + -ed[2]. Also written, incorrectly, hairbrained.] Having or indicating, as it were, no more brain than a hare; giddy; heedless; reckless; wild.

O painted fooles, whose hairbraindle heades must haue
More clothes attones than might become a king.
Gascoigne, Steele Glas (ed. Arber), p. 70.

Grave and wise persons . . . are extremely less affected with lust and loves than the hare-brained boy. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 718.

The hare-brained chatter of a few political babblers. C. Marvin, Gates of Herat, v.

harebrainedly (hãr′brãnd-li), adv. In a giddy, wild, or heedless manner.

subfamily Fuligulinæ, having in the male a cuneate tail with the central rectrices long-exserted. The only species is H. glacialis, the long-tailed duck, a very common bird of the northern hemisphere, also called oldwife, old-squaw, and south-southerly. The genus has also been named Pagonetta and Crymonessa.

harelip (hãr′lip′), n. 1. A congenital fissure or vertical division of the upper lip: so called from its supposed resemblance to the lip of a hare. The cleft is occasionally double, there being a little lobe or portion of the lip situated between the two fissures. It is surgically treated by smoothly paring the opposite edges of the fissure, and maintaining them in accurate apposition by a twisted suture until they have united.

This is the foul fiend Flibbertigibbet. He begins at curfew, and walks till the first cock. He . . . squints the eye and makes the hare-lip. Shak., Lear, iii. 4.

2. The hare-lipped sucker, Lagochila lacera, a catostomid fish remarkable for the conformation of the mouth, which suggests a harelip. The upper lip is not protractile, but is greatly enlarged, and the lower lip is divided into two separate lobes. It is abundant in the Scioto and a few other rivers in the Ohio valley and southward.

hare-lipped (hãr′lipt), a. Having a harelip.

harem (hä-rām′ or hā′rem), n. [Also haram; < *Turk. harem, < Ar. harām, anything forbidden, a sacred place or thing, in particular women's apartments, women, allied to Ar. harma, a lady (pl. harīm; el harīm, the female sex, whence the occasional E. form harim, hareem), < harama, prohibit, forbid.] 1. In Turkey, Egypt, Syria, etc., the part of a dwelling-house, including an inclosed courtyard, appropriated to the female members of a Mohammedan family, and so constructed as to secure the utmost seclusion and privacy. In India the corresponding chambers, offices, and inclosure are called the zenana.

This Duke here, and in other seralios (or Harams, as the Persians term them) has above 300 concubines. Sir T. Herbert, Travels in Africa, p. 139.

2. Collectively, the occupants of a harem, consisting in a Mohammedan family of the wife, or wives (usually to the number of four), female relatives of the husband, female slaves or concubines, and sometimes eunuchs as guardians and attendants.

Seraglios sing, and harems dance for joy. Cowper, Anti-Thelypthora, l. 108.

3. A sacred place; either of the holy cities Mecca and Medina, called the two harems, as places prohibited to infidels. [Rare.]

hare-mad† (hãr′mad), a. Mad as a March hare. See hare[1].

Also called thoroughwax.—2. A plant of the cruciferous genus Conringia, of either of the species C. Austriacum and C. orientale, having similar auriculate leaves.—Bastard hare's-ear, Phyllis nobla, a native of the Canary Islands, belonging to the Rubiaceæ.

hare's-foot (hãrz′fůt), n. 1. The hare's-foot trefoil, or rabbit-foot clover, Trifolium arvense. Also called harefoot.—2. A tree, Ochroma Lagopus, belonging to the family Bombacaceæ, a native of tropical America, the wood of which is very light, and therefore well adapted for rafts, boats, etc. It derives its name from the silk-cotton of the seeds, which protrudes from the openings in the large fruit after dehiscence, and resembles the foot of a hare. This cotton is used in stuffing cushions and pillows.—Hare's-foot fern, a fern (Davallia Canariensis) inhabiting the Canary and Madeira islands, and also found on the adjacent mainland of both Africa and Europe. The name is said to refer to its scaly, creeping rhizomes. The fronds are broadly triangular, from 6 to 15 inches in length, twice- or thrice-pinnate, the pinnules cut into narrow lobes. The indusium is whitish, and deeply half cup-shaped. In Australia this name is given to D. pyxidata. See Davallia.—Hare's-foot trefoil or clover. See clover, 1.

hare's-lettuce (hãrz′let″is), n. A composite plant, Sonchus oleraceus, better known as sow-thistle, a favorite food of hares. Also called hare's-colewort, hare's-palace, and hare-thistle. See Sonchus and sow-thistle.

hare's-palace (hãrz′pal″ās), n. Same as hare's-lettuce.

hare's-parsley (hãrz′pärs″li), n. An umbelliferous plant, Anthriscus sylvestris, common in Europe.

hare's-tail (hãrz′tāl), n. 1. A species of cotton-grass, Eriophorum vaginatum, common in Europe and North America. It belongs to the family Cyperaceæ, and is related to the club-rushes and bulrushes; but the bristles of the perianth are numerous, and become elongated in the mature fruit into fibers like those of cotton, which in this species are white, and form a ball or dense tuft which has been compared to the tail of a hare. See cotton-grass and Eriophorum. Also called hare's-tail rush.

2. The hare's-tail grass (which see, under grass).—Hare's-tail rush. See def. 1, above.

3. In math., involving or of the nature of the harmonic mean; similar to or constructed upon the principle of the harmonic curve. The first application of the adjective harmonic (in Greek) to mathematics was in the phrase harmonic proportion, said to have been used by Archytas, a contemporary of Plato. Three numbers are said to be in harmonic proportion when the first divided by the third is equal to the quotient of the excess of the first over the second divided by the excess of the second over the third; or, otherwise stated, when the reciprocal of the second is the arithmetical mean of the reciprocals of the first and third, the second number is said to be the harmonic mean of the first and third. Pythagoras first discovered that a vibrating string stopped at half its length gave the octave of the original note, and stopped at two thirds of its length gave the fifth. Now, as 1, $\frac{2}{3}$, and $\frac{1}{2}$ are in harmonic proportion, and as this phrase arose among the Pythagoreans, the word harmonic has always been held to have reference here to this fact (although Nicomachus explains it otherwise, from the properties of the cube, as ἁρμονία, or norm). The harmonic proportion or ratio, as thus defined, plays a considerable part in modern geometry as an important case of cross-ratio, and has given rise to the phrases harmonic axis, center, pencil, etc. (See below.) A harmonic curve is the figure of a vibrating string. It can assume many forms, but all may be regarded as derived, by summation of displacements, from simple harmonic curves, or curves of sines. The development of this idea has given rise to the theory of harmonics, which is one of the great engines of mathematical analysis. This gives the phrases harmonic analysis, function, motion, etc.

4. In anat., forming or formed by a harmonia: as, a harmonic articulation or suture.

Also harmonical.

Center of the harmonic mean of a number of points A, B, C, etc., in a line with reference to another point, O, in that line—a point M, such that

$$\frac{MA}{OA} + \frac{MB}{OB} + \frac{MC}{OC} + \text{etc.}, = 0.$$

Harmonic analysis. (a) In math., the calculus of harmonic functions; especially, the calculation of the constants involved in the expression of a phenomenon as a sum of harmonic functions. (b) In music, the analysis of the harmonic structure of a piece.—Harmonic arithmetic, the arithmetic of musical intervals.—Harmonic articulation. See def. 4, above.—Harmonic axis, a ray the intersection of which with any curve is the harmonic center of the intersections with the same curve of all the rays of a plane pencil. This term was introduced by Maclaurin.—Harmonic center of the nth order, of a number of points lying in one line, a point such that, if the reciprocal of its distance from a fixed pole be subtracted from the distances of the points of which it is the harmonic center, and if all products of n of these differences be added, the sum is zero.—Harmonic conics, two conics, (a, b, c, f, g, h)(u, v, w)^2 and (A, B, C, F, G, H)(x, y, z)^2, such that aA + bB + cC + fF + gG + hH = 0.—Harmonic conjugates. See conjugate.—Harmonic curve. See curve.—Harmonic division of a line, the division of a line by four points forming two pairs of harmonic conjugates.—Harmonic engine. See engine.—Harmonic figuration, in music: (a) A melodic figuration produced by using in succession the tones that constitute the harmonies or chords of a piece: as,

from

(b) The amplification of a harmonic passage by the introduction of passing-notes, etc.—Harmonic flute. See harmonic stop.—Harmonic function, a series composed of terms each the product of a function into the sine of a variable angle, these angles being in arithmetical progression; the general formula being $\sum_{-\infty}^{\infty} n \cos(nbt - c)$.

Also, an analogous function of two or three independent variables.—Harmonic mark, in musical notation for the harp and instruments of the viol family, a small circle (°) placed over a note that is to be played so as to produce a harmonic tone.—Harmonic mean, the reciprocal of the arithmetical mean of the reciprocals of the quantities concerned.—Harmonic modulation. See modulation.—Harmonic note. See harmonic tone.—Harmonic pencil, four rays lying in a plane and meeting in a point so as to divide harmonically every fourth line lying in the same plane.—Harmonic progression, in math., a series of numbers the reciprocals of which are in arithmetical progression: so called because they are proportional to the lengths of a string vibrating to the harmonics of one musical tone. Also called musical progression.—Harmonic proportion, the proportion existing between three numbers which form successive terms of a harmonic progression.—Harmonic reed. See harmonic stop.—Harmonic row, four points forming two pairs of harmonic conjugates.—Harmonic scale, in music, the scale or tone-series formed by the harmonics of a tone. See II., and the illustration there given.—Harmonic stop, in organ-building, a stop having pipes of twice the usual length, with a small hole at the mid-point, so that the halves of the air-column vibrate synchronously. The tone is sonorous and brilliant, and is not readily disturbed by overblowing, so that such stops may safely be subjected to an extra pressure of wind, and thus be utilized for striking solo effects. A harmonic flute is a flute thus constructed, and a harmonic reed a reed stop thus constructed, as, for example, a tuba mirabilis.—Harmonic suture. See def. 4, above.—Harmonic telegraph. See telegraph.—Harmonic tone, in playing the harp or instruments of the viol family, a tone produced by lightly touching one of the nodes of a vibrating string, or by changing the place of the contact of the bow, so as to suppress the fundamental tone, leaving certain sets of its harmonics unaffected. The result is a tone much higher than the fundamental, and very clear and pure in quality. To produce the first harmonic, the string must be touched at its half-way point; to produce the second harmonic, at a point one third of its length; etc. Harmonic tones made on an open string are called natural (see fig. 1), those on a stopped string artificial (see fig. 2); only those of the former variety are possible on the harp. The white notes represent the tone of the string, open or stopped; and the black notes, the harmonic tones actually produced. Also called flageolet-tones. Harmonic tones are not strictly harmonics of the fundamental tones with which they are related, because they are themselves complex.—Harmonic triad, in music, a major triad. See triad.—Harmonic triads, in math., two triads of points, a b c, A B C, taken on the same line, such that aA. bB. cC + aB. bC. cA + aC. bA. cB + aC. bB. cA + aB. bA. cC + aA. bC. cB = 0.—Simple harmonic function, a harmonic function consisting of a single term.—Simple harmonic motion, a motion expressible as a simple harmonic function of the time. Also called a harmonic motion or harmonic vibration.

II. n. 1. In acoustics: (a) A secondary or collateral tone involved in a primary or fundamental tone, and produced by the partial vibration of the body of which the complete vibration gives the primary tone. Nearly every tone contains several distinct harmonics, which are always taken from a typical series of tones the vibration-numbers of which, beginning with that of the fundamental tone, are proportional to the series 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, etc. The interval from the fundamental tone to the first harmonic is, therefore, an octave; to the second, an octave and a fifth; to the third, two octaves; to the fourth, two octaves and a major third; to the fifth, two octaves and a fifth; to the sixth, two octaves and somewhat less than a minor seventh; to the seventh, three octaves; etc. (See illustration.) Harmonics result from the elasticity of the tone-producing body, which leads it to vibrate, not only entire, but in its aliquot parts; thus, a violin-string tends to vibrate throughout its whole length, and also at the same time in each of its halves, thirds, quarters, etc. The vibration of the whole, being much the greater, gives the primary or fundamental tone; while the several partial vibrations, which diminish rapidly in force as they rise in pitch, give the harmonics. In a given tone the harmonics may usually be roughly detected by the unaided ear; but for precise and minute analysis specially constructed resonators are necessary. Tuning-forks and large stopped organ-pipes give only insignificant harmonics; certain reed-instruments, like the clarinet, give only selected sets of harmonics, as the second, fourth, sixth, etc.; while the human voice is capable of the greatest richness of harmonics. What is technically known as quality or timbre in a tone is due to the number and the relative strength of the harmonics contained in it. Different instruments and voices are thus distinguished from each other, and different uses of the same instrument or voice. In the voice, in particular, the essential difference between different vowel-sounds is a matter of harmonics. In any tone the lower harmonics are strictly consonant both with the primary tone and with each other: hence the use in the organ of mutation- and mixture-stops, whereby the consonant harmonics of a given tone are much emphasized. Many of the higher harmonics, on the other hand, are strongly dissonant both with the primary tone and with each other: hence the discordant quality of such instruments as cymbals, and the peculiar construction of the pianoforte, whereby dissonant harmonics are suppressed. In instruments of the viol and harp classes very beautiful effects are produced by suppressing the primary tone, leaving one set of its harmonics to sound alone. Such tones are called harmonic tones, or simply harmonics (though they are themselves compounded of a primary tone and its harmonics). In instruments of the trumpet class, like the horn, all the tones ordinarily used are really harmonics of the natural tone of the tube, and are produced by varying the pressure of the breath and the method of blowing. The same is true to a less degree of instruments of the wood-wind group. Harmonics are also called overtones. All the tones, primary and secondary, entering into the constitution of an actual tone are often called partial tones, or partials, the fundamental tone being the first partial, and the harmonics the upper partials. (b) A harmonic tone.—2. In math., a function expressing the Newtonian potential of a point in terms of its coördinates.—Artificial harmonic, natural harmonic. See harmonic tone, under I.—Grave harmonic, the low tone generated by the simultaneous sounding of two concordant tones. See combinational tone, under tone.—Sectorial harmonic, a spherical surface-harmonic the axes of which lie equidistant in the plane of the equator.—Solid harmonic, any homogeneous function of x, y, and z which satisfies Laplace's equation. A solid harmonic usually expresses the potential due to pairs of equally and infinitely attracting and repelling points placed infinitely near to one another.—Spherical harmonic. See Laplace's function, under function.—Spherical surface-harmonic, or Laplace's coefficient, an expression of the variation of the potential over the surface of a sphere. Every such harmonic supposes the existence of a certain number of fixed axes through the sphere. It is obtained by taking the product of the cosines of the angular distances of the variable point from some of these axes, together with the cosines of the angular distances of pairs of the other axes, until each axis has been used once, and once only, in forming the product, and then summing all possible products of this sort.—Zonal harmonic, a spherical surface-harmonic which has all its ★axes coincident.

Fundamental.

harmonica (här-mon'i-kạ), n. [NL., fem. of L. harmonicus, musical: see harmonic.] 1. Same as musical glasses (which see, under glass).—2. A musical toy consisting of a set of small metallic reeds so mounted in a case that they may be played by the breath, certain tones being produced by expiration, others by inhalation. Also called harmonicon.—Somzee's harmonica, a device for preventing accidents from fire-damp in a mine. The draft upon a flame burning in a glass chimney is so regulated that while the air remains pure the flame is silent, but when its density is altered by the mixture of a certain proportion of fire-damp it gives a musical tone, as in the chemical harmonicon.

harmonical (här-mon'i-kạl), a. [< harmonic + -al.] Same as harmonic.

> It were but a phantasticall deuise and to no purpose at all more then to make them harmonicall to the rude eares of those barbarous ages.
> Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 11.

> After every three whole notes, nature requireth, for all harmonical use, one half note to be interposed. Bacon.

harmonically (här-mon'i-kạl-i), adv. 1. In a harmonic manner; harmoniously; specifically, in music, in a manner suitable to the rules of harmony, as distinguished from melodically or rhythmically.

> Plato therefore intending to declare harmonically the harmony of the four elements of the soul, . . . in each intervall hath put down two medieties of the soul, and that according to musicall proportion.
> Holland, tr. of Plutarch, p. 1022.

2. In acoustics, by or in harmonics. See harmonic, n., 1.

> They may heat absorbent gases, such as ammonia, and cause them to do mechanical work, or to produce sound, if the incident beam be intermittent or harmonically variable. A. Daniell, Physics, p. 512.

3. In math., in a harmonic relation. Thus, two segments, AB, MN, of the same straight line are said to be harmonically situated when AM. BN + AN. BM = 0.

> The three diagonals of a four-side cut each other harmonically. Encyc. Brit., X. 392.

4. In anat., so as to make a harmonia.

harmonichord (här-mon'i-kôrd), n. [< Gr. ἁρμονία, harmony, + χορδή, a chord.] A musical instrument having a keyboard and strings like a pianoforte, in which the tone is produced by the pressure against the strings of small revolving wooden wheels covered with resined leather. The tone resembles that of a violin. The principle of the tone-production is the same as that of the hurdy-gurdy. Also called piano-violin, violin-piano, tetrachordon, xanorphica, etc.

harmonici (här-mon'i-sī), n. pl. In anc. music, theorists who reached harmonic rules by induction from subjective aural effects, as opposed to canonici, or those who deduced rules from a mathematical theory of intervals. Also called harmonists, and, from their leader (Aristoxenus, a Greek peripatetic philosopher, a disciple of Aristotle), Aristoxenians.

harmonicism (här-mon'i-sizm), n. The state of being in harmonic proportion.

harmonicon (här-mon'i-kon), n.; pl. harmonica (-kạ). [NL., < Gr. ἁρμονικόν, neut. of ἁρμονικός, musical: see harmonic.] 1. See harmonica, 2.—2. An orchestrion.—3. An acoustical apparatus consisting of a flame of hydrogen burning in a glass tube so as to produce a musical tone. See singing-flame. The principle has been used in a musical instrument, sometimes called chemical harmonicon, but better pyrophone (which see).

harmonics (här-mon'iks), n. [Pl. of harmonic, after Gr. ἁρμονικά, the theory of sounds, music, neut. pl. of ἁρμονικός: see harmonic.] 1. The science of musical sounds: a department of acoustics. [Rare.]

> During the era in which mathematics and astronomy were . . . advancing, rational mechanics made its second step; and something was done towards giving a quantitative form to hydrostatics, optics, and harmonics.
> H. Spencer, Universal Progress, p. 175.

2. The mathematical theory of harmonics (see harmonic, n., 2), or the development of expressions for the Newtonian potentials.

harmonious (här-mō′ni-us), a. [= F. harmonieux = Pg. harmonioso = Sp. It. armonioso, < L. harmonia, harmony: see harmony.] 1. Exhibiting harmony or being in harmony; having parts, forms, relations, or proportions properly accordant each with the others, so that all taken together constitute a consistent or an esthetically pleasing whole; also, being in harmony or concord with something else; congruous.

What is harmonious and proportionable is true.
Shaftesbury, Misc. Reflections, iii. 2.

God hath made the intellectual world harmonious and beautiful without us. Locke.

2. Specifically, in music, concordant; consonant; symphonious; agreeable to the ear. See harmony.

Thoughts, that voluntary move Harmonious numbers. Milton, P. L., iii. 38.

The Samian's great Æolian lyre, . . .
Its wondrous and harmonious strings
In sweet vibration, sphere by sphere.
Longfellow, Occultation of Orion.

3. Marked by harmony in action or feeling; acting or living in concord; peaceable; friendly: as, harmonious government; a harmonious family.

And in the long harmonious years . . .
May some dim touch of earthly things Surprise thee ranging with thy peers.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, xliv.

Harmonious motion, the motion of a vibrating body.

For harmonious motion the ears were made.
Dee, Pref. to Euclid (1570).

=Syn. 2. Melodious, dulcet, tuneful.—3. Amicable, brotherly, neighborly, cordial.

harmoniously (här-mō′ni-us-li), adv. In a harmonious manner; with harmony; with accord or concord.

harmoniousness (här-mō′ni-us-nes), n. The character or condition of being harmonious.

harmoniphon (här-mon′i-fon), n. [< Gr. ἁρμονία, harmony, + φωνή, sound.] A musical instrument consisting of a series of free metallic reeds inserted in a tube like that of a clarinet, the wind being supplied by the breath through a mouthpiece, and its admission to the reeds being controlled by a keyboard like that of the pianoforte.

harmonisation, harmonise, etc. See harmonization, etc.

harmonist (har′mō-nist), n. [< harmon-y + -ist.] 1. One skilled in the principles of musical harmony; also, a musical composer.

The towering headlands, crowned with mist,
Their feet among the billows, know
That Ocean is a mighty harmonist.
Wordsworth, Power of Sound, xii.

A musician may be a very skilful harmonist and yet be deficient in the talents of melody, air, and expression.
Adam Smith, The Imitative Arts, ii.

2. pl. Same as harmonici.—3. One who shows the agreement or harmony between corresponding passages of different authors; specifically, a writer of a harmony of the four gospels.

Out of a dread to admit the slightest inaccuracies in the Gospels, the Harmonists convert the evangelical history into a grotesque piece of mosaic.
G. P. Fisher, Begin. of Christianity, p. 406.

4. [cap.] A member of a communistic religious body organized by George Rapp in Würtemberg on the model of the primitive church, and conducted by him to Pennsylvania in 1803: their settlement there was called Harmony (whence their name). They removed to New Harmony in Indiana in 1815, but returned to Pennsylvania in 1825, and formed the township of Economy on the Ohio near Pittsburgh, and later a new village of Harmony. They disbanded in 1904. They were communistic, holding all property in common; discouraged marriage and sexual intercourse; and held that the second coming of Christ and the millennium are near at hand, and that the whole human race will be saved. Also Rappist and Economite.

harmonistic (här-mō-nis′tik), a. [< harmonist + -ic.] 1. Pertaining to or of the nature of harmony. Specifically—2. Pertaining to a harmony or reconciliation of apparently conflicting passages, as in different literary works, systems of law, etc.

The effect of the harmonistic assumption . . . is to lead to a mechanical combination of two or more relations.
G. P. Fisher, Begin. of Christianity, p. 405.

The systematization of the law, by means of a harmonistic exegesis, which sought to gather up every prophetic image in one grand panorama of the issues of Israel's and the world's history. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 54.

harmonium (här-mō′ni-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ἁρμόνιον, neut. of ἁρμόνιος, harmonious, < ἁρμονία, harmony: see harmony.] One of the forms of the reed-organ (which see). The essential difference between the harmonium and the so-called American organ lies in the fact that in the former the air is compressed by the bellows and thence driven out through the reeds, while in the latter the bellows produce a vacuum into which the outside air is drawn through the reeds. Harmonium is the usual term in England and France for all reed-organs.

harmonization (här″mō-ni-zā′shọn), n. [< harmonize + -ation.] The act of harmonizing, or the state of being harmonized. Also spelled harmonisation.

The life of the social organism must, as an end, rank above the lives of its units. These two ends are not harmonious at the outset; and though the tendency is towards harmonization of them, they are still partially conflicting.
H. Spencer, Data of Ethics, p. 134.

harmonize (här′mọ̄-nīz), v.; pret. and pp. harmonized, ppr. harmonizing. [= F. harmoniser = Sp. armonizar = Pg. harmonisar = It. armonizzare; as harmony + -ize.] I. intrans. To be in harmony. (a) In music, to form a concord; agree in sounds or musical effect. (b) To agree in action, adaptation, or effect.

Magnificent versification and ingenious combinations rarely harmonise with the expression of deep feeling.
Macaulay, Dryden.

At Sebenico we see side by side a bit in one style and a bit in the other [Gothic and Renaissance], and yet the two contrive to harmonize. E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 94.

(c) To agree in sense or purport. (d) To agree in sentiment or feeling; be at peace one with another. =Syn. To agree, accord, correspond, tally, square, chime, comport.

II. trans. 1. To make harmonious; adjust in fit proportions; cause to agree; show the harmony or agreement of; reconcile contradictions between.

Various attempts to harmonize the views of the parties proved abortive.
Woolsey, Introd. to Inter. Law, App. ii., p. 429.

2. To make musically harmonious; combine according to the laws of counterpoint; also, to set accompanying parts to, as an air or melody: as, a harmonized song.

A music harmonizing our wild cries.
Tennyson, Sea Dreams.

Also spelled harmonise.

harmonizer (här′mọ̄-nī-zėr), n. One who harmonizes; a harmonist. Also spelled harmoniser.

harmonometer (här-mọ̄-nom′e-tėr), n. [Irreg. < Gr. ἁρμονία, harmony, + μέτρον, a measure.] An instrument or monochord for measuring the harmonic relations of sounds. It often consists of a single string stretched over movable bridges.

harmony (här′mọ̄-ni), n.; pl. harmonies (-niz). [< ME. harmonie, armony, < OF. harmonie, F. harmonie = Pr. armonia = Sp. armonía = Pg. harmonia = It. armonia = D. harmony = G. harmonie = Sw. Dan. harmoni, < L. harmonia, < Gr. ἁρμονία, a concord of sounds, music, a system of music, esp. the octave-system; personified, Harmonia, Music, companion of Hebe (Youth), the Graces and the Hours, daughter of Ares and Aphrodite, and wife of Cadmus (see harmonia); a particular use of ἁρμονία, a joining, joint, proportion, order, rule, pattern, cf. ἁρμός, a fitting, joining, ἁρμόζειν, fit together, join, set in order, < ἀρειν*, fut. ἀρεῖν, join: see arm[1], arm[2], article, etc.] 1. A combination of tones that is pleasing to the ear; concord of sounds or tones.

He [the angler] hereth the melodyous armony of fowles.
Juliana Berners, Treatyse of Fysshynge, fol. 2.

Grit pitie was to heir and se
The noys and dulesum hermonie.
Battle of Harlaw (Child's Ballads, VII. 182).

O mighty-mouth'd inventor of harmonies, . . .
God-gifted organ-voice of England.
Tennyson, Milton.

2. Especially, in music: (a) Music in general, regarded as an agreeable combination of tones. (b) Any simultaneous combination of consonant or related tones; a concord. (c) Specifically, a common chord or triad. See triad. It is tonic when based directly on the tonic or key-note, dominant when based on the dominant or fifth tone of the key. (d) The entire chordal structure of a piece, as distinguished from its melody or its rhythm. Harmony is two-part, three-part, four-part, etc., according to the number of the voice-parts employed. It is strict or false, according to its observance of established rules of chord-formation and voice-progression. It is simple when not more than one of the essential tones of the chords is doubled, compound when two or more of those tones are doubled; compound harmony requires more than four voice-parts. It is close when the voice-parts lie as close together as the structure of the chords will allow; dispersed, extended, open, or spread, when they are so separated that by transposition of an octave any one would fall between two others. It is plain when only essential tones are used and when derived chords are but sparingly introduced; figured, when suspensions, anticipations, passing-notes, etc., are used for melodic and rhythmic variety, or when foreign tones are frequently introduced. It is diatonic when only the tones of a given key are used, chromatic when other tones also appear. It is pure when performed in pure intonation, tempered when performed in tempered intonation. (e) The science of the structure, relations, and practical combination of chords: the fundamental branch of the science of musical composition. It regards composition rather vertically than horizontally, noting especially the chords involved, and studying the voice-parts only so far as their nature or relations affect the value and interrelation of the successive chords. It treats of the following topics: intervals, consonant or dissonant, typical or derived, perfect, major, minor, diminished, or augmented; chords, both triads and seventh-chords, typical and derived (with their inversions), major, minor, diminished, and augmented, with their esthetic value both independently and comparatively; voice-progression, from chord to chord, direct, oblique or opposite, pure or false, including the preparation and resolution of discords; suspensions, anticipations, passing-notes, and all other melodic interferences with regular chords, including figuration; tonality or keyship, with special regard to the relations of the tonic and dominant chords, to the use of derived chords, and to the formation of cadences; modulation, or the alteration of tonality by the use of tones foreign to the original key, with the classification of key-relationships; thorough-bass, the science of indicating harmonic facts by figures and signs appended to the notes of a given bass. Harmony is now technically distinguished from counterpoint, and regarded as the more elementary branch of composition; but historically counterpoint preceded it by some centuries. Harmony in the modern sense did not become possible until between 1550 and 1600, when the esthetic value of chords as such was recognized for the first time in scientific music. Its development since that time has been steady and radically important to musical history. Its rules have been modified more or less so as to admit to usage, under certain conditions, many chord-formations and voice-progressions at first regarded as entirely impermissible. The growth of instrumental music, especially of that for the organ and pianoforte, has considerably influenced the conception of harmonic canons, leading them away from the simplicity originally derived from a purely vocal standard. Acoustical researches have also, from time to time, led to rearrangements of harmonic material. The great body of harmonic principles is now substantially accepted by all theorists, in nearly identical form, as the only sound basis for a thorough science of composition or a just method of criticism. Numerous efforts have been made by the profounder musical theorists to discover more comprehensive principles of composition from which the ordinary rules of harmony may be deduced, but with as yet but uncertain practical result.

3. Any arrangement or combination of related parts or elements that is consistent or is esthetically pleasing; agreement of particulars according to some standard of consistency or of the esthetic judgment; an accordant, agreeable, or suitable conjunction or assemblage of details; concord; congruity. Harmony is to be distinguished from symmetry: thus, in a symmetrical building, two opposite wings are exactly identical, though usually with the architectural members in inverse order, while in a harmonious building the two wings need not be identical in a single detail, if they balance each other so as to form, taken together, a pleasing and consistent whole.

All men in shape I did so far excel
(The parts in me such harmony did bear),
As in my model Nature seem'd to tell
That her perfection she had placed here.
Drayton, Pierce Gaveston.

The qualities of the active and the contemplative statesman appear to have been blended in the mind of the writer into a rare and exquisite harmony.
Macaulay, Machiavelli.

What we call the progress of knowledge is the bringing of Thoughts into harmony with Things; and it implies that the first Thoughts are either wholly out of harmony with Things, or in very incomplete harmony with them.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 110.

4. Accord, as in action or feeling; agreement, as in sentiment or interests; concurrence; good understanding; peace and friendship.

Harmony to behold in wedded pair
More grateful than harmonious sound to the ear.
Milton, P. L., viii. 605.

Thus harmony and family accord
Were driven from Paradise.
Cowper, Task, vi. 379.

No States cherished greater harmony, both of principle and feeling, than Massachusetts and South Carolina.
D. Webster, Reply to Hayne.

5. A collation of parallel passages from different works treating of the same subject, for the purpose of showing their agreement and of explaining their apparent discrepancies. Specifically—(a) A consecutive account of all the facts of the life and ministry of Jesus Christ, presented in the language of the gospel narratives, so brought together as to present as nearly as possible the true chronological order, with the different accounts of the same transactions placed side by side to supplement one another. (b) A table in which references to the different gospel narratives are printed in parallel columns.

6. In anat., same as harmonia, 1.—Constablished harmony. See constablish.—Essential harmony, in music: (a) The harmony of a composition when reduced to its simplest form by the omission of all decorative matter. (b) The tonic, dominant, and subdominant triads of a major key.—Harmony or music of the spheres, according to the fancy of Pythagoras and his school, a music, imperceptible to human ears, produced by the movements of the heavenly bodies. Pythagoras supposed these motions to conform to certain fixed laws which could be expressed in numbers, corresponding to the numbers which give the harmony of sounds. The seven planets produced severally the seven notes of the gamut.

And after shewede he hym the nyne speris [spheres];
And after that the melodye herde he,
That cometh of thilke speris thryes thre,
That welle is of musik and melodye
In this world here, and cause of armonye.
Chaucer, Parliament of Fowls, l. 63.

Look how the floor of heaven
Is thick inlaid with patines of bright gold.
There's not the smallest orb which thou behold'st
But in his motion like an angel sings,
Still quiring to the young-eyed cherubins:
Such harmony is in immortal souls;
But, whilst this muddy vesture of decay
Doth grossly close it in, we cannot hear it.
Shak., M. of V., v. 1.
